"How I Became a Better Pastor"

"I wanted to further my education, but I didn't want to leave my ministry, uproot my family, and become a full-time student. Luckily, there was Trinity Theological Seminary. My counselor at Trinity helped me to establish a personalized degree program that allowed me to study at home and still receive an accredited, quality education. I was also able to apply what I learned as I learned it, and my ministry was enriched. I would highly recommend Trinity to any pastor who wants to grow in his ministry."

Trinity Theological Seminary is the only seminary in the United States accredited by the University of Liverpool. Through our external studies program, on-line learning, and residency seminars, you will receive a quality education that will enrich your life and enhance your ministry. Talk to the admissions counselors at Trinity and map out a better ministry, both for you and for your pastorate.

NO ONE BUILDS A BETTER CHAIR THAN BERTOLINI INC.

Unsurpassed Quality: While others use low quality materials like particle board and cheap foam, we use 7 ply marine birch plywood and commercial grade 2 lb. foam. Others offer flat seats and backs, we offer body contoured seating with superior comfort. Simply put, while others try to get by with the bare minimum, Bertolini Inc. builds chairs to last a lifetime. Watch our video and see for yourself.

FREE Fund Raising Program:

Our goal is not just to sell chairs, our goal is to partner in the ministries of local churches. Bertolini Inc. now offers churches FREE fund raising tools and literature to help you afford one of the biggest investments your church will make. Also ask about 100% financing.

Design: We offer over 60 of the most attractive chair designs in the industry today in a wide range of colors and fabrics. Ask about our custom manufacturing capabilities.

Factory Direct: We offer the best prices in the industry because we are the manufacturer, not just the reseller. Tours given daily.

Warranty: We offer the best warranty in the business. We put it in writing and we stand behind it.

Experience: The Bertolini family has over 30 years of chair manufacturing experience. We will be there to service your needs for decades to come. Ask about 100% financing.

SEEING IS BELIEVING

Let us send you our 12 minute video and see for yourself why no one builds a better chair than Bertolini Inc.

How Should We Pray for Cuba?

INSIDE CT

When associate news editor John Kennedy was returning from Cuba, he discovered that his seatmate's experience was an interesting contrast to his own. John was traveling as part of a team of religious journalists sponsored by the Center for International Policy, a Washington think tank interested in promoting democracy abroad. His seatmate's official task had been to deliver $100 worth of medical supplies to Cuba, which he did.

John went in order to assess the state of the Cuban church. He interviewed leaders and heard their stories of persecution and their plans for the future "after Castro." (See his report, "Cuba's Next Revolution," beginning on p. 18.)

His seatmate, on the other hand, went to have a good time. By bringing in medical supplies, he slipped through the humanitarian loophole in the U.S. prohibition against visiting Cuba. (There is another exception for the press.)

Once inside Cuba, the willing hedonist gets low rates for room, board, and sex; prostitution has become a major growth industry for women hard pressed for hard currency, and many men are "vacationing" in Cuba in order to engage their services.

Which raises the interesting question: How should we pray for Cuba? After the obvious first petition for the passing of the Castro regime, the rest is not so clear. Before Castro, Cuba was a hedonic paradise where gambling and prostitution flourished. When the Cold War was hot, American Christians passionately supported our government's anti-Communist efforts in the name of freedom. We understood this to mean freedom to worship. But others saw it as the freedom to pursue any pleasure they wanted. If the U.S.'s long-sought dreams come true and Castro falls, should we be thrilled that Cuba will open to satellite TV, McDonald's, and the return of casinos?

John talked to Pastor José M. Vera, a Cuban exile in Miami, who has observed a troubling phenomenon among zealous Christians who are forced out of Cuba and land in the U.S. He says many of these Cubans experience a kind of culture shock from a society that offers beepers, cellular phones, and so many other consumer goods. As a result, Vera has trouble keeping Christians on fire once they reach Miami. Few are interested in any church activity beyond the Sunday morning service.

We will pray that the Cuban church receives the freedom to worship and preach the gospel, that persecution will end, and that the church will flourish. But if that freedom comes bundled with coaxial cables and microwave ovens, we must help them understand how to be disciples in a secular, hedonistic, consumerist society. But have U.S. Christians learned how to do that?

A HUNDREDFOLD RETURN

Words can hardly express what I felt as I read "100 Things the Church Is Doing Right" in your November 17 issue. I was inspired as I read that real people, who have a strong, vibrant love for others generated by the Savior's love for them, are all over this sin-saturated planet making a real difference in so many lives! Your cover feature proves yet again that hearing God's message is wonderful, because "faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word"; but it also proves just as certainly that faith comes by seeing the message when it's lived by people created in God's image. I find it hard not to weep when I see firsthand the difference a relationship with Jesus can make. There is no better way to reclaim lives than to get the church involved, as you so convincingly show in your contemporary example of the hundredfold return.

*John H. Busser Malachi Ministries
Minneapolis, Minn.*

■ I especially appreciated the balance of evangelism/social action represented by your choices. In a time when much of evangelicalism seems to be in a defensive posture towards the secular world, these "light" stories provide a much needed reminder that God is still changing the world through his people. My only regret—as a New Englander—is that you didn't manage to locate anything good happening in New England. I assure you that God is working here as well, doing powerful things through the churches in our region.

Paul Borthwick Lexington, Mass.

■ I commend you on a most inspirational issue! It's the first time in years that I've read an entire issue of a magazine from cover to cover in one sitting. I was moved to tears before I got through #1.

*Stella Penner
Edmonton, Alta., Canada*

■ I congratulate you for discovering that God is alive and well in Jackson, Mississippi. Voice of Calvary Ministries is indeed worthy of mention. And Ronnie Crudup, who sat next to me on many Board of Servant meetings of Voice of Calvary Ministries, is an extraordinary servant of God—as is Thomas Jenkins, chairperson, who also has a vital pastoral training ministry in French West Africa. The church, without these usually unsung heroes, would not be as vibrant as it is in many parts of this country.

*Les Stobbe Vision New England
Burlington, Mass.*

This letter is written to show my disapproval of "Chuck Singleton, The Abolitionist." I am cognizant of the accusations that Sudan and other African countries have continued with the horrific trade in human beings. If true, such workings are to be actively condemned at all costs. However, one certainly cannot justify the assumption that Islam condones slavery any more than Christianity does. Also, the hinted assumption that Islam condones prejudice is also certainly not correct.

The problem of the Sudan is not unique. Persecution seems to be a growing global trend. The focus is on Christian oppression, but globally, many others are oppressed as well.

*Juan P. Alvarado

WHOSE REPENTANCE?

Although I support Promise Keepers and its mission, I am unclear what the group means when its leaders call for repentance for racism ["Will the Walls Fall Down?" Nov. 17]. If they mean to say that individual members of PK who have harbored racist thoughts or engaged in racist behavior ought to repent, that seems right. However, if they are calling for all members of PK to repent for racism, as if the guilt of some were imputed to all, that cannot be right, since clearly not all men (including both whites and blacks) who attend a PK rally are racists. PK is a wonderful movement whose leaders should clarify exactly what is meant by "racial reconciliation." PK should not be PC.

*Prof. Francis J. Beckwith
Trinity Graduate School, California
Anaheim Hills, Calif.*

■ Author Joe Maxwell's suggestion that a group of one million men made up of 80 percent whites and 14 percent African-Americans is off-balance is ludicrous. What better statistical representation of our national complexion could he have needed to witness? While we are all created equally in the eyes of our Lord, we are not equally distributed in this nation. A 50-50 split would have been a very sad reflection on the white male population. Thank God it was a representative one instead.

Rick Rapier Scottsdale, Ariz.

I read Seven Promises of a Promise Keeper. I told myself I would remember it was a man's book and I would be objective. I prayed I would have an open mind. I hadn't gone 20 pages until I thought, these men are being led to believe they are "saviors," and by 50 pages I was convinced.

I am not a radical feminist or a member of NOW. I am a retired military wife, and we worshiped in an army chapel. We always treasured our worship there. When Promise Keepers came in we couldn't accept their theology, felt uncomfortable, and left. If the church we now worship in is invaded by Promise Keepers, we will again depart.

Leavenworth, Kans.*

WOMEN AS "MORAL LIGHTWEIGHTS"

■ After reading "Men Behaving Justly," by Frederica Mathewes-Green [Matters of Opinion, Nov. 17], I first felt uneasy and later angry. Her assertion that "women need to be tamed by men as well, particularly in moral issues" is demeaning. First, the author suggests that Christian women tend not to hold themselves to as high a moral standard as do Christian men. I cannot think of a more inaccurate generalization. The Christian women I know do not skirt around moral right and wrong or "consider human factors rather than principles of right and wrong in making ethical decisions" as Mathewes-Green argues. Second, the picture presented of male-female relationships is clearly one of the marriage relationship. If it is true that women need men to call them "upward toward the highest moral principles," then where are the single women left? Hopelessly abandoned in the dust of their own moral waywardness?

*Julia Brooks

BIBLICAL STANDARDS

■ Thanks for the refreshing interview with Barbara Dafoe Whitehead [Conversations, Nov. 17]. She speaks a message on divorce the church needs to hear. In its passion to be culturally sensitive and rele-

Even when they disagree, Christians should share the same position.

Where there's disagreement, there's reason for prayer. Because in the humble search for God's answers we find understanding. So before you take a stand for what you believe, spend some time on your knees.

TRUTH IN LABELING

Do inclusive-language Bibles distort Scripture? After reading both sides of the issue [Nov. 17], I am resigned to answer with a firm "yes and no." I agree with Dr. Grudem ("Yes") that accommodation of culture at the expense of accuracy is too high a cost to pay. It is not the Word of God that must become "all things to all people," but the messenger of the Word of God. As to Dr. Osborne ("No"), I would agree with his concern that polarization and name-calling among evangelicals over this issue will not help the mission of the church. We seem to be willing to allow a great deal of latitude in creating missionary translations, so why can we not see our own culture as a mission field?

There is an element of trust missing in this entire discussion. I, for one, trust that God will preserve his Word, no matter what mere men (that is, humans) try to do with it. It is, after all, his Word. If gender-neutral or inclusive-language translations are not of him, then I am confident that they will end up on the backlist of publishing history. If inclusivist translators disagree, and believe they are truly doing God's work, then let them clearly and confidently identify their "translation theory" on their work. Truth in labeling is the only ethical, honest option for evangelical translators.

*Clay Clarkson
Fort Worth, Texas*

I became a Christian by reading an NIV Bible. I had tried reading the Bible many times but had been mystified by church language and strange idioms. Through the NIV, the Lord became personal and his message understandable. Within a year, I was in Bible college and headed toward a career as a translator overseas.

Now in graduate studies, I rarely use the NIV. Nor do most scholars, for it is not literal enough for the exacting world of academia. Though an excellent translation and model for dynamic equivalence, the NIV is not the Bible of exegetes, but of the masses. Yet by necessity, it is the exegetes and professional scholars who control its contents. This aspect of the current argument I have not heard discussed.

When the scholars tell us we must hold to a specific form of the NIV, or preachers proclaim the KJV as inerrant, our leaders are no better than the pre-Reformation church, which said, "We will tell you which version to read, and we will tell you what it means." Through the years, translation arguments have assumed that the form is somehow sacred, and those who do not understand the form merely need instruction, not a new form. The unbeliever or nominal Christian is left at the mercy of the priest, the preacher, or the scholar, not the Word of God.

[Bruce] Metzger describes translation as "the art of making the right sacrifice." Are we willing to sacrifice the sacredness of the literal form in order to bring God's Word to a generation? Or will we choose to elevate the form and possibly sacrifice the generation? Let us look to these inclusive versions not as a new standard the

IS IT POSSIBLE TO GAIN THE WHOLE EVANGELICAL WORLD AND LOSE YOUR SOUL?

Have you ever wondered why your Christian experience doesn't measure up to the radically abundant life described time and again in the Bible? As evangelicals, we have good intentions and participate in many of the right activities—prayer, quiet-time, Bible study, church—and in some ways are changed by Christ. Yet, if honest, we're often left asking, "Is this all there is?"

Jesus said, "Anyone who drinks the water I give him will never thirst. . . . The water I give will be an artesian spring within, gushing fountains of endless life."

Follow Me, by Jan David Hettinga, explores our tendency to live for things like money, relationships and power, and shows us how to commit our whole hearts to Christ.

If you are like many, your Christian experience falls somewhat short of "artesian springs" and "gushing fountains."

Why is it that the soul quenching reality of Jesus' enticing offer remains so elusive? How can we have this exhilarating, joyful life from God?

Thankfully, the fullness of this life is available. But it doesn't develop automatically. It has to be cultivated.

This intentional development of Christ's life within us is what spiritual formation is all about.

The books in this line offer no shortcuts. No simple formulas. What they do present are insightful perspectives and practical tools designed to deepen your spiritual life. They are rooted in Scripture and have been proven by Christians throughout the centuries.

The mission of the NavPress SPIRITUAL FORMATION LINE, under the guidance of pastor, author, and teacher Dallas Willard, is to form the whole person so that the nature of

In His Image, by Michael Wilkins examines the meaning and significance of reflecting Jesus to the world around us.

Christ becomes the natural expression of our daily lives.

At NavPress we hope that over time what you learn from these books will make a difference in your life, like it is beginning to in ours.

Love Your God With All Your Mind by J. P. Moreland demonstrates the important role your mind plays in loving God.

UPCOMING BOOKS IN THE SPIRITUAL FORMATION LINE

The River Within by Jeff Imbach offers a liberating look at the tie between loving God and passionate living. (May 1998)

Growing in Intimacy With Christ by Gary Thomas looks at the meaning of true intimacy with Jesus. (August 1998)

Soul Keeping by Howard Baker examines the age old Christian practice of spiritual direction. (September 1998)

A major part of the problem is the lack of a neutral third person singular pronoun in the English language. I propose this radical solution: let's make one. People are inventing words all the time for various uses, so why not just make one up? My suggestion is Qe (pronounced key). For one good reason, it will not be confused (in written form anyway) with other words, and it follows the he/she form. More importantly, it will give relief to millions of Scrabble players around the world who get stuck with a Q and no U! So please, language scholars of the world, unite. Go for coffee at your next convention and come up with one lousy word we can all use in place of that pesky he (where appropriate, of course). Is that too much to ask?

*Rev. Joell Haugan

The "literal translation" arguments of Wayne Grudem convince me, whereas the "dynamic translation" arguments of Grant Osborne ring hollow. Seeing their reasoning debated side-by-side was what needed to understand all the issues.

Now I wonder, "At what cost to accuracy have I been enjoying the readability of my NIV Bible for all these years?"

*Amy M. Givler

One issue which has concerned me greatly is the attempt by American conservatives to control the publication of Bible translations in the United Kingdom—since they have put pressure on the Bible distributors of the NIVI (which we already have) to withdraw the version from British shelves. I wonder if they do not believe that Christians in the U.K. are spiritual enough or intelligent enough to think, pray, and study for themselves, and so we need the benevolent use of American power to control the Bibles we choose to use. After all, of course, the only serious Bible scholars and theologians in the English-speaking world must be Americans!

Perhaps they are blithely unaware of the offense their actions cause, and of the absolute arrogance it displays when they feel it to be their God-given right to control the walk of Christians in other nations. Perhaps they forget that using their economic clout to dictate to the Inter-

■ I really appreciated your balanced coverage of the gender-inclusive translation controversy. With Grudem's and Osborne's arguments facing each other, it is easier to appreciate the other point of view. I have been reading CT for many years now, and this confirmed my confidence in your reporting.

By the way, I'm curious: Did anyone research the spelling of the vegetable in the title of the article "Your Sins Shall Be White As Yucca" or did some editor with a spell-checker "fix" it? "Yuca" (pronounced yoo-kah) is a starchy root that is a staple food all over Peru: as an MK there

I know it well; "yuca" (pronounced yuck-ah) is a desert tree that grows in southwestern U.S.A. There is no similarity other than spelling.

Was the inspiration of Scripture of God sufficient for all people of all time? Or did the Spirit fail to anticipate the social environment of late twentieth-century Western culture? If he did, is the Lord trying to make up for his error by leading the inclusivists to correct his mistakes? My assumption is the Holy Spirit did not err in using third-person singular pronouns and masculine nouns in so many verses.

The task of the church and its teachers is to lead men and women to understand the biblical revelation. Adapting the text to suit the whims of secular-minded people has the opposite effect. To obscure the intentions of the Holy Spirit creates far more misunderstanding than, as Osborne suggests, leaving number and gender as they are. If we can change them, we might also change case just as easily.

Teen pregnancy rates double since 70s

First came legal abortions, then rise in child abuse.

Partial-Birth Abortion: The brutal truth

Assisted suicide, a short step from murder

Happy Anniversary.

January 22, 1998, will mark the 25th anniversary of Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion. Not only has 25 years of legal abortion failed to be the predicted "cure" for social problems such as child abuse and teenage pregnancy, it has led to other societal evils no one would have imagined in 1973.

Look at the facts:

- CHILD ABUSE rates have risen steadily, doubling between 1986 and 1993.
- THE UNMARRIED TEEN PREGNANCY rate has doubled since 1972.
- THE HIDEOUS PARTIAL-BIRTH ABORTION

procedure has been employed, in which a living, unborn child is pulled, feet first, from the mother's womb until all but its head is exposed. The abortionist stabs the baby through the base of the skull, inserts a catheter, and suction out the baby's brains.

• "ASSISTED SUICIDE" is now a real threat to the ill, the elderly, and people with disabilities.

What next? To help bring an end to this horrible blight on our country, fill out and send in the coupon at right. You can make a difference. And maybe the next anniversary will be a happy one.

WHAT REALLY DIED IN OREGON

The state's voter-approved suicide law represents more than an extreme belief in personal autonomy.

On November 4, the Beaver State became the Suicide State. Oregon voters reaffirmed a ballot measure on physician-assisted suicide (CT News, Nov. 17, 1997, p. 64). The last time they considered this issue, it squeaked by with a 2 percent margin, and a judge put the matter on hold. This time the spread was a solid 20 percent, and the court lifted the injunction.

Why did assisted suicide make sense to more voters this time? Perhaps because only the "useful" computes in our pragmatic age, and the value of life—especially one where there is suffering—is no longer self-evident. So why not be rational and end it?

What has really died is transcendence, the sense that undergirding our existence is a great, self-existent I AM who provides meaning, coherence, and direction to all that is. It is this religious sense that Michigan's infamous Dr. Jack Kevorkian considers the biggest obstacle to the rational adoption of assisted suicide. "Religious dogma has become part of the marrow of humanity. We can't get rid of it," he protests. "There should be absolutely no connection between medicine and religion, but there is, and it's paralyzing." Does he see no connection? "Going through medical school," he says, "... I knew euthanasia wasn't immoral, because my mind just wasn't encumbered with all this crap, you know?"

Suspicion that religion was contaminating medicine was also a factor in Oregon. The Catholic church, along with other pro-life Christians, fought the measure. The moral protest of religious groups was undermined by the pro-suicide forces, who broadcast scare ads, claiming the Catholic church was trying to control the lives of Oregonians.

When belief in God is gone, the claims of religion are interpreted as the mere exercise of power. Moral guidance from the church is no longer seen as standing for virtue or benevolent concern for the commonweal. Instead, it is routinely interpreted as the way the powerful oppress the powerless and limit their freedom. The language of civil and human rights is coopted by interest groups eager to secure their piece of the power pie. As Richard John Neuhaus has observed, today you only have rights worth respecting if you can assert them.

THE VALUE OF THE VULNERABLE

While proponents of assisted suicide say they are asserting their right to self-determination (which Dr. Kevorkian labels his "highest ethical principle"), they are actually endangering the vulnerable. Who is more vulnerable to the short-sighted vision of utilitarianism than someone who believes he or she has a degenerative disease, or who is discouraged by an inadequate response from the medical system, or who has not been formed by a community that strives for virtue and godliness, or who is coping alone?

Christians know the vulnerable are valuable because they mark a border that we must defend: for if we protect the vulnerable from the false compassion of those who would relieve our medical system of bearing their expense and purge the tax rolls of their care and the families of their burden and then cleanse the gene pool of their "pollution"—if we protect "the least of these" we have protected all, the greatest and strongest as well.

REPRINTED FROM THE OREGONIAN, WITH THE PERMISSION OF CARTOONIST JACK OHMAN

But the vulnerable are valuable in their own right. Our Lord would not break a "bruised reed" nor extinguish a "smoking wick." He is the one who "had no form nor comeliness that we should desire him." In identifying with the lowest, he who was highest demonstrated their ultimate value. Anything that endangers them should put his followers on alert.

Just how much does assisted suicide endanger the vulnerable? At this point, Oakland County, Michigan, is the main laboratory in which we can observe how it works. There, although the county attorney has assiduously prosecuted Dr. Kevorkian to the full extent of the law, juries and judges have given Dr. Death a relatively free hand. In that laboratory, we can see how patient vulnerability is exploited, and much-touted safeguards disregarded. Like other proponents of assisted suicide, Kevorkian has reassured the public by offering safeguards. But the Detroit Free Press has shown that he has violated his own guidelines with impunity. They report:

- Kevorkian says every assisted-suicide candidate must undergo extensive counseling with him. In fact, counseling is often limited to phone calls and brief meetings that include family members and friends.

- Kevorkian says every candidate must be examined by a psychiatrist. In fact, there was no psychiatric exam in at least 19 Kevorkian-assisted suicides.

- Kevorkian says patients who complain of chronic pain should be examined by a specialist in pain control. In fact, there have been at least 17 assisted suicides in which people complained of chronic pain, but Kevorkian did not refer them to a pain specialist.

- Kevorkian says he must make a detailed review of the patient's medical records. In fact, there have been some instances in which he received only a brief summary of the attending physician's prognosis.

- Kevorkian says candidates should be suffering from an incurable affliction or one that cannot be treated without intolerable side effects. In fact, autopsies of three Kevorkian-assisted suicides revealed no anatomical evidence of disease.

- Kevorkian says at least 24 hours should elapse between a patient's final request and death. In fact, at least 19 patients died less than 24 hours after meeting Kevorkian for the very first time.

These reports show that a utilitarian mindset can rationalize any exception to principled safeguards. Such guidelines prove to be mere window dressing for the benefit of those at a distance. Those who become involved in assisted suicide discover a different reality. As Oakland County undertaker-poet Thomas Lynch opines in his new book The Undertaking: "Where abortion is available on demand, should we really expect to moderate or regulate assisted suicide?"

ABANDONED BY THE MEDICAL SYSTEM

The Free Press reports show something else: that through our present medical system, we do not adequately care for the vulnerable. In many of the Kevorkian cases, assisted suicide was chosen by people with treatable conditions who were bounced from specialist to specialist without coordinated care: people with chronic illnesses who were not given adequate guidance and aid in coping; people whose pain was not taken seriously; people whose mental-health issues were ignored by those who treated their bodies; and in a few cases, people who were simply misdiagnosed. Several patients said Kevorkian was the first doctor who ever listened to them. These people were not driven to Kevorkian because they were sick; they sought him out because they were set adrift, and he was willing to talk to them and offer them a plan.

Concern for the vulnerable must not stop at opposing assisted-suicide legislation. It must also work for renewal (dare we say revival?) of the patient-centered care that characterized both the Hippocratic and the Christian medical traditions. It must work to preserve medical services in our urban centers, where hospital closings by distant corporate owners are becoming all too frequent. Ultimately, this is a question in which the values of the marketplace are undermining human and divine values. Hospitals will close, doctors will provide minimal care, patients with terminal diseases will be shunned and shunted off, all because the marketplace knows only utility. "Unvexed by the existentials," writes Lynch, "should we not expect the marketplace to take over? The questions devolve from whether or not to who is entitled to who's going to pay to cash or charge? to do you take American Express?"

We need a revolution in values—a revolution that cannot be raised without the conversion of many hearts and the care of many loving hands. CT

SPECIAL NEWS REPORT

Cuba's Next REVO

First contact: Pope John Paul II (left) greets Fidel Castro at the Vatican in November 1996. The two leaders will meet again this month in Havana.

EVOLUTION

How Christians are reshaping Castro's Communist stronghold.

JOHN W. KENNEDY
in Havana and Miami

In 1994, Cuban secret police arrested Eliezar Veguilla after the pastor organized a Baptist conference in Havana that attracted 5,000 youth. Police charged him with being a counterrevolutionary spy working for the CIA.

Cockroaches crawled over Veguilla's body during confinement in darkness up to 16 hours a day. Authorities told Veguilla that if he refused to confess to being a CIA operative he would be placed in a cell with a ferocious bear, visible through a screen.

Then prison guards threw him into a dimly lit dungeonlike room with a bear. A frightened Veguilla prepared to meet his Maker. "I decided at that moment never to confess anything to the government," Veguilla, 39, told CHRISTIANITY TODAY. But he had been tricked. This was a different bear, declawed and chained.

Two days later, the mind games returned. Moments after hearing gunfire and screams, authorities lined Veguilla up against a wall as a firing squad raised its guns. Ordered to confess, Veguilla, emboldened by the life-changing encounter with the bear, shouted "Cuba for Christ! Cuba for Christ!" The rifle triggers clicked, but the firing chambers clinked empty. Veguilla, now a refugee in the Miami area, will never forget the sound of soldiers laughing after his mock execution.

WHEN WILL CUBA OPEN? Although few Cuban Christians are subjected to such terrifying experiences, church leaders are keenly aware of the state's ruthless exercise of power under Fidel Castro. Soon after seizing power in 1959, Castro implemented hard labor and so-called re-education programs for those he considered the dregs of society: drug addicts, prostitutes, homosexuals—and pastors. Nearly 40 years later, the re-education camps are gone. But physical beatings and other ill treatment of prisoners remain potent weapons of the Communist regime.

"As long as Castro is alive he will be able to maintain control," says 53-year-old church historian Marcos Antonio Ramos, a Baptist pastor who is dean of the South Florida Center for Theological Studies in Miami. "Sooner or later, Cuba will open. When is the $64,000 question."

As Castro, 71, this month begins his thirty-ninth year as dictator, Cubans sense that their island's next revolution has already begun.

The Vatican, the Cuban exile community in southern Florida, the U.S. government, Castro loyalists, and Cuban minorities—including evangelical Protestants—are all vying for an influential role in Cuba's future.

Some hope that this month's visit of Pope John Paul II will be the catalyst to bring a swift conclusion to the Castro era. The pope's presence spurred on the collapse of communism in heavily Catholic Poland in the 1980s. "This could be a watershed event that galvanizes change, either peaceful or revolutionary," says Nina Shea, director of Freedom House's Washington, D.C.-based Puebla Program on Religious Freedom.

In the short term, Christians hope the papal visit will open the gates to additional religious liberties. But some are wary, believing it could spark religious persecution of an intensity not seen since the early days of the communist revolution.

The pontiff will celebrate open-air masses in Havana, Santa Clara, Camagüey, and Santiago. The Cuban Council of Churches will distribute 100,000 Bibles as gifts during the papal visit, and Protestants are hoping to be in the crowds to worship outside their church walls for the first time in nearly four decades.

In June, Havana's archbishop, Cardinal Jaime Ortega, 61, conducted the first outdoor service permitted in the country since 1961. Since then, the government has permitted door-to-door visitations in which Catholic volunteers distributed photos of the pope and invited residents to church. Large outdoor banners declaring "John Paul, messenger of truth and hope, welcome" are on display.

After months of wrangling, the Cuban government in November finally authorized the January 25 docking in Havana of a Miami cruise ship of 1,200 Catholic faithful to see Pope John Paul II. With U.S. State Department approval, Miami's Roman Catholic archdiocese is sponsoring the cruise 90 miles off the Florida coast as a likely last opportunity for parishioners to see the 77-year-old pontiff. The move has caused deep division among Cuban exiles in Miami, many of whom denounce it as inappropriate as long as Castro still rules.

In Cuba, some Protestants fear a potential backlash from the papal stay if the Catholic church becomes cozy with the government. "I hope the visit means a greater freedom of religion," says Richard Luna, Miami regional director for Open Doors with Brother Andrew. "But if this turns out to be a meeting between two heads of state, each with a specific constituency that does not include the evangelical church, it could be very harmful for evangelical Christians."

Ortega himself believes euphoria generated by the papal stopover will not last after John Paul II returns home. "There is great openness in anything that has reference to the pope's visit, but not in other areas," Ortega, who had been forced to work in a military camp in 1966, told CT. "We have more frequent dialogue with the state now, but many of the problems have not been solved."

"We expect only trouble out of the pope's visit," says Assemblies of God (AG) national superintendent Héctor A. Hunter, who is concerned about a new wave of oppressive restrictions on Protestants. Unlike the blocklong compound that serves as Catholic diocese headquarters in Havana, Hunter's unadorned office is in a simple house in a poverty-stricken neighborhood.

SECULARIST PARADISE? Before Castro came to power, Cuba was the most secularized Latin American country, with only 6 percent of the population regularly attending church. Unlike most other Spanish-speaking Latin American countries, Cuba does not have a history of Catholic dominance, and that could hinder the impact of John Paul II's tour. "The pope is not visiting Poland; the pope is not visiting Mexico; the pope is visiting Cuba," says Ramos, author of Protestantism and Revolution in Cuba (University of Miami, 1989). "One single event won't change Cuba. It's a controlled society, a secular society, and the church in Cuba is not that strong."

Early on in Castro's reign, a few religious leaders inserted themselves into social movements, figuring cooperation with the Communist government would be the only way to secure vehicles or building materials. But most clergy went on the defensive, and some spent time in prison. There had not been a tradition of ecumenism in Cuba. When Catholic priests and Protestant preachers found themselves in the same prison camps, seeds of cooperation took root. Today, about 40 percent of the population has been baptized Catholic—including Castro, who was raised Catholic and attended Jesuit schools.

After nearly four decades of unrealized communist dreams, Cubans are ripe for change. There is a spiritual hunger in the land, a void that Marxism has been unable to fill. Out of a population of 11 million, the number of active Christians is approaching 1 million, the most ever.

Castro realizes Christians now represent a potent force. He met with 70 representatives from 31 denominations, primarily members of the Cuban Council of Churches, in a nine-hour meeting on November 24. Castro asked the religious leaders to pray for the nation's economic problems, including decreased sugar production, declining foreign investments, and a dearth of international credit.

The dictator is willing to bend in order to preserve his revolution—and his power. In 1990, as the Soviet Union came apart, Castro faced fresh demands for reform and decided to allow religious meetings in homes. Previously, Christians had not been allowed to build new churches or repair existing cramped, crumbling structures because of shortages in everything from cement to nails.

But the response caught the government off guard. Now at least 3,000 Protestant house churches are active, spurring an ongoing revival that has affected virtually all Protestant denominations as well as the Catholic church.

A house group of Camagüey AG evangelist Orson Vila grew to more than 1,500 people, 80 percent of them young professionals disillusioned by economic hardship and ideological emptiness. Two-thirds of the AG's 50,000 adherents meet in house churches. The denomination had only 7,000 followers a decade ago. "It is the Spirit of God moving among the young people," the AG's Hunter told CT. "There is a spiritual hunger for God."

Other denominations report similar growth, both numerically and in enthusiasm. "God has his time to do his work, and now is his time in Cuba," says Roy Ruiz, president of the Council of Methodist Churches in Cuba. Attendance at Methodist churches has tripled to 40,000 since the authorization of house churches.

"This is the most important moment in our evangelical history," says Western Baptist Convention of Cuba president Leoncilo Vegaulla, Eliezer's father. "People are coming to church without invitations. Every church is packed in each service."

New freedom: Cardinal Jaime Ortega (holding cross) leads the first open-air religious service in Cuba in more than three decades at Havana's cathedral last June.

The revival has a Pentecostal bent, not only among traditional charismatics, but also among many Methodists, Presbyterians, and Baptists (CT, April 25, 1994, p. 19). Yet denominations have retained their distinctives. "Our service is very lively and experiential," says Hector Mendez of Havana's First Presbyterian Church, which has grown from 60 to 400 since he became pastor in 1991. "But we are within the Reformed tradition."

THE COST OF COOPERATION: Yet, more unity existed in the 1960s when people of faith faced communism as a common enemy. More freedom has brought more squabbling over how—or whether—to cooperate with government authorities and with one another.

For example, the government has designated the Cuban Council of Churches as the only agency to be allowed to import and distribute Bibles. Since the decade began, the council says, an average of 100,000 Bibles has been imported each year, an annual amount equal to the number of Bibles imported during the previous 20 years.

But the council of churches has only 25 out of 54 denominations as members. Bible distribution is supposed to be prorated according to church membership, but some American evangelicals complain the Bibles do not reach their intended destination through the council of churches. Thus, many denominations have resorted to bringing in Bibles and videos through foreign tourists and Americans on government-sanctioned religious visits.

"We have never been a member of the council of churches, and we hope we never will," says AG superintendent Hunter. To be ecumenical in Cuba, Hunter says, is to be too closely identified with the government.

Raúl Suárez, pastor of Ebenezer Baptist Church in Havana and director of the Martin Luther King, Jr., ecumenical center, has not only chosen to cooperate with the government, he is part of it. Six years ago he became one of the first three Christians elected—unopposed, as is the case of all representatives—to the national Communist legislature. As such, he has been able to secure food, medicine, medical equipment, and school buses from the United States for different churches.

But Vicente Calvo, a Baptist who is also a human-rights activist, blames Suárez for politicizing the church. Calvo criticizes Suárez for defending the government's human-rights record and denying that the government ever placed restrictions on Bible distribution. Suárez admits to being

Brothers to the Rescue Pawn in Policy Discord

Even though the United States has failed to oust Fidel Castro from power after nearly four decades, most Cuban Americans support U.S. policy efforts against the dictator. But not 57-year-old José J. Basulto, president of Brothers to the Rescue, an organization that conducts humanitarian searches for refugee rafters in the Florida Straits.

His ministry has seen the inert side of U.S. policy firsthand. On February 24, 1996, Cuban jet fighters without warning shot down two unarmed Cessnas in the Florida Straits, killing four Brothers to the Rescue volunteers: Mario de la Pena, 24; Pablo Morales, 29; Carlos Costa, 29; and Armando Alejandro, Jr., 45. Basulto later found out that U.S. radar had been tracking the Cuban MiGs for nearly an hour, but federal officials did nothing to warn Brothers' pilots.

Cuban Ministry of Foreign Affairs spokesperson Rafael Céspedes told CT in Havana, "We had our reasons. They had violated our territory 25 times." But Basulto contends the planes were over international waters.

"They had been practicing to kill us," says Basulto, who flew a third plane and eluded fire before he returned safely to Miami.

Rather than apologize for failing to warn the pilots, the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) revoked Basulto's pilot's license for violating Cuban airspace. He sued the FAA, spending $75,000 in legal bills in an effort to get the license back. A judge ordered the license to be reinstated after 150 days, but the FAA has continued to enforce the revocation in what Basulto believes are political motivations to keep him from provoking Cuba.

But Brothers to the Rescue flights continue at least weekly because Cubans are still fleeing on crudely constructed rafts. The pilots drop food, potable water, and medicine to keep rafters alive. Those picked up by the U.S. Coast Guard are returned to Cuba and face up to five years in prison.

With a core group of 70 pilots, observers, and volunteers, Basulto founded Brothers to the Rescue in 1991. "Our people were dying," Basulto recalls. "Some wars are won not by killing people but by saving people."

Brothers to the Rescue has conducted more than 1,800 aerial search missions and has been directly responsible for saving 4,200 lives. Yet as many Cubans in search of freedom die as are rescued. They drown in storms, wither in the scorching sun, or are maimed by sharks.

Since the early 1960s, Cubans have been forbidden to emigrate from the island. In 1994, President Clinton announced that Cubans, who had traditionally been allowed automatic entry into the United States if they escaped, would be returned. The United States ended its open-door policy of accepting boat people after 30,000 refugees wound up at Guantanamo Bay and eventually were resettled in the United States by World Relief (CT, April 3, 1995, p. 92).

"The U.S. government is culpable by neglect," says Basulto, who has criticized U.S. policy since the Bay of Pigs. Basulto joined the underground against Castro in 1959 and participated in the failed 1961 invasion after being recruited by the CIA. These days, Basulto, a Catholic, has pictures of peacemakers in his modest Miami office: Jesus, Gandhi, Martin Luther King, Jr.

Unlike most Cuban Americans who are apprehensive of criticizing Castro, Basulto holds the dictator directly responsible for the deaths of his fellow pilots.

"Castro can kill me," Basulto says. "I'm living on spare time. I have been dead since 1996." The eyes of the father of five mist as he remembers his dead colleagues. "They were like my own sons."

a proponent of liberation theology and identifying with the social-justice element of Castro's revolution.

"Between Christianity and the revolution there is no contradiction, but neither is there identification," Suárez says. "There are more elements in socialism that coincide with my faith than elements of capitalism. Marxism is a Latin American concept that emerged from poverty and misery. It's important not to just think about faith, but live among the poor."

While Cuba and the United States are worlds apart on many matters of faith, there has been upheaval over the same doctrinal differences that divide Christians in the United States. For example, Western Baptists in Cuba, who have ties to U.S. Southern Baptists, booted out Suárez over political and theological differences, such as women's ordination.

CHURCH RELIEF EXPANDS: The granting of limited religious freedom reveals Castro's pragmatism, not a change of heart. He has consented to churches taking the lead in humanitarian aid efforts in part because it saves the government money. After the collapse of Soviet aid beginning in 1991, Castro has, out of desperation, sought foreign investment, permitted limited self-employment, and allowed the U.S. dollar as a parallel currency.

Caritas Cubana in Havana, one of the few independent nongovernmental organizations, is a Roman Catholic agency that dispenses $5 million a year in relief aid. "The government is suspicious that any organization like this offering humanitarian aid is undermining the government," says Rolando Suárez Cobián, director of Caritas Cubana. "There is always a political interpretation for any humanitarian action."

The government allows Caritas Cubana to monitor U.S. supplies that have been approved for sale in government-run hospitals, such as x-ray film, pacemakers, and prescription drugs. Caritas, which has 6,000 volunteers, must certify that the supplies are not being used to help soldiers. "This is the only way the Cuban government can buy low-priced medicine," Cobián says.

EMBARGO HINDERS MINISTRY: The United States has enforced a full trade embargo against Cuba since 1961, when Castro nationalized all U.S. property. The embargo, defended vigorously by the powerful Cuban expatriate community in southern Florida, limits what ministry can be conducted on the island.

Some Cuban officials see the papal visit as a means to weaken American resolve for the embargo and expose the U.S.

"The visit will show not only the strength of the revolution but our willingness to improve relations with the church in Cuba," Ministry of Foreign Affairs spokesperson Rafael Céspedes told CT in Havana. "If the pope calls directly for an end to the U.S. embargo, the U.S. Congress would have to listen. The pope, of course, is a moral authority."

Other church leaders have tried but failed to weaken the embargo. Pastors for Peace in Brooklyn, New York, has circumvented the embargo but has been ineffective in forcing the government to re-evaluate it. "The U.S. is pathologically obsessed with the need to force Cuba under its control," asserts Lucius Walker, a Baptist pastor who heads Pastors for Peace. "The blockade is a violation of international law to use food and medicines as weapons." Walker questions why the U.S. government is providing famine relief for its Communist enemy North Korea, but refuses to do the same for nearby Cuba. Walker's group has shipped 1,500 tons of medical equipment, bicycles, medicines, toys, and school supplies to Cuba, all without U.S. government approval.

"The embargo is contrary to the gospel," Walker told CT. "We stand under condemnation from our faith if we say that the way to help children is by starving them. As nonsensical as it seems, we cannot deliver a cup of cold water from a U.S. port." Americans may not enter Cuba without going through a third country, such as Mexico, Canada, or the Bahamas.

While the United States has prohibited trade with Cuba since President Kennedy's first year in office, the Helms-Burton Act in 1996 has further tightened the embargo. The measure passed both chambers of Congress less than two weeks after the 1996 Brothers to the Rescue shootdown (See "Brothers to the Rescue Pawn in Policy Discord," p. 21). Critics contend Helms-Burton will cause more disease and malnutrition as supplies of everything from bandages to syringes dwindle.

"The Cuban people are suffering a lot because of this policy," says government affairs spokesperson Céspedes. He calls Helms-Burton a "brutal policy" that is "trying to destroy Cuba."

Among the staunchest supporters of the embargo is Republican congressional representative Lincoln Díaz-Balart of Miami. He says the embargo has prevented "complicit slave labor" that exists in China, where U.S. corporations are investing heavily in enterprises but workers never see the money. Other foreign firms are deterred from trading with Cuba because U.S. business interests have no access to the Cuban market, says the 44-year-old Díaz-Balart, in Congress since 1993.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION: Although Christians are a minority and unorganized, Castro sees the church as his primary rival.

Subsequently, any religious activity—from the pope's outdoor mass to a small congregation's purchase of pencils—requires extensive bureaucratic approval.

Historically, if certain congregations have experienced too much growth or seem too influential, the Castro regime devises new restrictions. Rules implemented in October prohibit churches from buying electrical goods such as fax machines, computers, and photocopiers. The new rules also prevent religious charities from buying diapers, cribs, cooking utensils, and soap.

"Castro is the law of the country," says 63-year-old Miami pastor José M. Vera, who had been national Open Bible superintendent before fleeing in 1961. "He allows Christians a certain amount of freedom, but they are always like fish on a line."

"The government hasn't changed toward religion and always sees Christians as the main people against the government," says Alexander Pons Palaez, a 26-year-old refugee resettled by World Relief in July in Carol Stream, Illinois. He had been incarcerated for three years beginning at age 15 for erecting "Down with Fidel" posters. "Fidel can't accept that Cuban people love God more than the state."

Government spokesperson Céspedes disagrees. "We have never been antireligious," he asserts. "We had some problems early on with certain religious leaders, but in 1991 we opened our party to religion. Atheism has been dropped as the official creed of the party."

JOHN W. KENNEDY

UNCERTAIN BOUNDARIES: Yet, constraints that limit Christian expression are formidable. Religious literature distribution outside church buildings is illegal. Airing Christian television or radio programs is banned. Praying for God to heal the sick is considered an illegal practice of medicine. Denominations cannot operate elementary or secondary schools.

"There are restrictions on how churches can organize, raise money, evangelize, and proselytize," says Freedom House's Shea. "People are uncertain where the boundaries are. Everything is a privilege, not a secure right." The constitution declares that no freedoms are allowed that are "contrary to the decision of the Cuban people to build socialism and communism."

Despite criticisms that he is too sympathetic to the government's policies, Suárez is responsible for the biggest threat to the regime: In 1990 he convinced Castro to permit Christians to meet in homes.

"In one sense he is cooperating with the government," says Sam Williams, a Cooperative Baptist pastor from Richmond who has visited Suárez's church four times. "But he has been instrumental in the government loosening restrictions on Christians practicing their faith and dropping the requirement that one must be a practicing atheist to be in the government."

Nevertheless, many house churches keep meeting underground. "The state has been acting prudently in the face of illegal house churches," Suárez says. "If they close them, there will be an international scandal."

Castro learned a lesson from what happened to Camagüey evangelist Vila in 1995. Government officials presented Vila, a regional AG director, a list of 85 house churches to be closed immediately. He refused, and four months later 30 police officers arrested him. The same day, Vila received a 23-month hard labor prison sentence for allowing "illicit meetings." Vila's wife, Naomi, also a licensed AG pastor, took over supervision of 200 cell groups that continued to thrive. Meanwhile, in prison, Vila's preaching converted hundreds.

Despite theological differences with the AG, the Cuba Council of Churches intervened to free Vila, even though council leaders felt he had disobeyed the government's order. Catholic hierarchy also protested on Vila's behalf. He ended up serving nine months in prison.

The new freedom of religious expression exists in tension with state control. "There is a great opening, but it's happening hand in hand with the greatest oppression since the early 1960s," says Open Doors' Luna, who discovered firsthand in 1995 that repression still occurs. Plainclothes officers told Luna they had files of photographs and signed affidavits to prove he had been a CIA agent "involved in espionage, sabotage, and blowing up bridges and electrical plants." Luna's real mission had been smuggling Bibles. Officials expelled him from the country immediately after interrogation.

PASTOR SHORTAGE: Most Cuban denominations are short of pastors and resources for theological education. There are a dozen small seminaries and Bible schools for Cuban Protestants. Enrollment is limited, largely because denominations cannot afford to provide books, food, class space, and scholarships for more than a few dozen students.

In the Baptist Convention of Western Cuba, for instance, there are only 63 pastors for 310 preaching sites. There are only 41 students enrolled in ministerial courses at Baptist Theological Seminary of Havana, although 150 are on a waiting list.

Seminary training is especially important now as young professionals flock to the faith, most of them from non-Christian backgrounds. Churches have managed to grow through local lay-leadership training programs.

Some of the best Cuban seminary professors and pastors, including 90 percent of Methodist ministers and two-thirds of Presbyterian clergy, fled when the revolution showed its socialist face, often leaving untrained teenagers to replace them. Virtually all 250 U.S.-based missionaries had fled or been deported by 1961.

"The Cuban church has proven it can survive and develop without the help of missions and foreign missionaries," says Ramos, who immigrated to Miami in 1966. "They lost along the way many of

Santería Holds Cuba in Thrall

The most widespread form of religion in Cuba today is neither Protestant nor Catholic, but a syncretistic belief system called santería—"way of the saints."

Santería is the largest of the Afro-Cuban religions brought by slaves as a way to trick slave owners. While publicly confessing Catholic saints, the slaves privately venerated animistic gods and goddesses of their homeland. Believers worship these African gods, orishas, through plant, food, and animal sacrifices offered during chants and dancing initiations.

Santería worship is conducted in homes, and as many as 3 million Cubans may be involved. Some Catholic priests welcome it as a way to attract parishioners to Christian teachings while others see it as demonic. Though evangelicals believe santería is evil, the movement has found its way into mainline Protestant denominations.

Pablo Odén Marichal, vicar general for the only Episcopal diocese on the island and head of the Havana-based Cuban Council of Churches, sees no contradiction in mixing the beliefs, goat and chicken sacrifices notwithstanding.

"Why should I view santería as a threat?" Marichal asks. "In one of my Episcopal congregations, three santería people come with [ceremonial] dresses and preach."

There are more santería priests in Havana than Catholic priests in all of Cuba. But with no hierarchy or centralized leadership, the religion has never been a threat to Castro. Santería has spread throughout the Caribbean and to the United States, where there are an estimated 800,000 devotees of different nationalities.

In the United States, the Supreme Court in 1993 struck down a city ordinance and ruled that live animal sacrifices in religious rites are constitutionally protected. Residents in the Miami suburb of Hialeah had complained about the stench from animal sacrifices at the Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye. CT

Bittersweet Cuban Memories

One Cuban who does not miss his native land is Noble Alexander, a Seventh-day Adventist youth pastor from a Havana suburb who spent 1962 to 1984 in nine Cuban prisons.

Two armed G-2 agents, the Cuban equivalent of the KGB, arrested the 28-year-old Noble after he preached at a service in February 1962. His crime? A sermon about original sin.

Prisoners would be his congregants the next 22 years. Many fellow Christian prisoners submitted to Castro-style re-education, which included renouncing faith in Christ. Alexander refused. He received a sentence of 20 years of hard labor for conspiring to assassinate Castro, aiding and abetting the flight of counterrevolutionaries, and distributing opium—that is, Christianity—to the people of Cuba.

Throughout his incarceration, Alexander endured physical and psychological torture. His cellmates included rats, cockroaches, snakes, and lizards. Prison authorities slapped Alexander so hard he still hears ringing in his ears. He suffered food poisoning from eating maggot-ridden gruel. He lost consciousness being dunked in an icy lake while bound. He passed out three times from the pain of being whipped with electrical cables. He sustained gunshot wounds in his hand, leg, and thigh.

"No one can be truly certain of his faith and endurance until he is forced to test them," Alexander says.

Despite the abuse, Alexander organized underground churches in prison. "Baptist, Seventh-day Adventist, Presbyterian, Methodist, Catholic—our fellowship recognized no boundaries," Alexander writes in I Will Die Free (Pacific Press, 1991). "Though chained by hatred and deprivation, our pitiful group of Christian brothers declared themselves free in Christ."

When uncovered, his religious activities brought further punishment. Possession of a Bible resulted in a 90-day sentence inside a coffinlike box where he could barely move. After being caught possessing a hymnal, he was forced to stand in a showerlike stall for 42 days with water dripping unceasingly on his head and nails protruding from the floor at his feet.

For refusing to work on the Sabbath, Alexander was dunked into a cesspool of rotting debris and putrid excrement for three hours. Officials reclassified him as a "dangerous religious fanatic" and moved him to a section with psychotic murderers and the mentally ill.

But Alexander says the worst agony he experienced involved his Christian wife, Yraida, who divorced him in 1965 in order to marry a Cuban army captain. When he went to prison, he and Yraida had been married three years and had a two-year-old son, Humberto. Slowly Alexander recovered from his despair, and the prison church became his new bride.

When his scheduled release date came in 1983 authorities told him he could go—as soon as he submitted to the government re-education program.

Meanwhile, Alexander's mother and sister in Salem, Massachusetts, enlist the support of their Methodist pastor, Willis P. Miller, to organize a prayer group and public campaign for his release. Tom White of the Voice of the Martyrs, a fellow prisoner for 18 months, convinced Jesse Jackson to seek Alexander's freedom when Jackson met with Castro. Cuba deported Alexander to the United States in June 1984 as a "humanitarian gesture."

Many of Alexander's dreams have gone unfulfilled, and he has bittersweet memories of Cuba. His son, now 36, remains a Communist stalwart. Ex-wife Yraida has rededicated her life to Christ and begged—and received—Alexander's forgiveness.

Alexander and his Puerto Rican wife, Carmen, have been married four years. At age 63, he is pastor of Hispanic Seventh-day Adventist churches in Cambridge and Chelsea, Massachusetts. His first sermon in the United States dealt with the origin of sin, the topic that he had preached as a free man in Cuba. Alexander has learned that God is his sustaining joy.

"I have no plans for retiring," Alexander says. "Preaching is my life."

their finest leaders and a good portion of their resources. But new leaders have risen to the cause, and lost resources have been replaced by a new quota of local and personal sacrifice."

U.S. missionaries or pastors can enter Cuba if they are invited by a denomination and they obtain a religious visa that includes a detailed itinerary. In 1994, Cuban authorities ousted several U.S.-based missions organizations, including Campus Crusade for Christ, Open Doors with Brother Andrew, and Youth With a Mission (YWAM). Many U.S. groups bring in not only Bibles, tracts, and Christian videos, but also medicine, clothes, hygiene products, even auto parts. The Bartlesville, Oklahoma-based Voice of the Martyrs (VOM) takes materials—which are sometimes confiscated—to Cuba on a weekly basis through tourists entering via Mexico and Costa Rica.

Tom White, now U.S. director of VOM, is not afraid of being caught. He spent 18 months in a Cuban prison after his plane crashed on the island in 1979. White, 50, had tossed thousands of packets containing the Gospel of John from planes for seven years. White's book, God's Missiles Over Cuba, now in its fourth printing, describes his 24-year sentence for counterrevolutionary activities and his confinement with rats and in refrigerated prison cells. Castro released him after international pressure, which included a personal plea from Mother Teresa.

SPIRITUAL IMPERIALISM? While appreciative of the relief flowing to Cuba from humanitarian Americans, religious leaders in Miami hope there will not be a deluge of overbearing missionary activity when Cuba opens again. "It's important for people to go in to help people, not to manipulate them," says Humberto Cruz, a 60-year-old Baptist pastor in Miami who immigrated in 1967. "The leaders are already there. They don't need Cuban-American imperialism."

But San Antonio evangelist Sammy Tippitt says he goes not out of any colonialist ambitions but because he is invited by Cubans hungry for Bible teaching. He makes an annual trip in conjunction with an Eastern Baptist Convention retreat for pastors. Tippitt's ministry, God's Love in Action, finances the trip because Cubans simply do not have the money. The government offered no explanation when it canceled his scheduled journey in November.

American evangelicals, mindful of how cults invaded post-Communist Russia, also want to make sure that materials sent have sound doctrine. "Christian leaders in Cuba have a heart to disciple young people, but they don't have tools available," says YWAM's Steve Tackett of Nashville. "They can't go to a Christian bookstore and buy discipleship materials. When the government falls, we don't want there to be a vacuum like there was in the Soviet Union."

Barry Owensby, president of World Street Evangelism in Jacksonville, Florida, has made two dozen trips to Cuba following invitations from churches. "We are strategically set because I have established contacts with 100 pastors," he says. "As soon as freedom comes, I will move in a matter of days to set up outdoor crusades with various pastors."

While acknowledging that U.S. missions agencies must be aware of their own paternalistic tendencies, Gregory C. Wallace of Overseas Council of Indianapolis says Cubans must have financial assistance to keep training new Christians. Overseas Council is facilitating the theological education of 45 students at New Pines Seminary in Placetas. The six professors are Cuban, but the financing is American, including money for constructing student apartments and a dining hall.

Although there are no Christian media on the island, residents are able to hear Christian broadcasts from other countries. A 500,000-watt Trans World Radio signal north of Venezuela beams 32 hours of Spanish language programming to the island each week, including U.S.-based shows such as Back to the Bible and Our Daily Bread. The various programs receive an average of 200 letters per month from Cubans.

POST-CASTRO BLOODBATH? As Cuba enters its season of transition, Castro continues to reiterate long-held tenets.

In October, Communists convened their first party congress in six years and made it clear that further reforms will not happen any time soon. The dictator also reaffirmed that his 66-year-old brother Raúl, who is head of the armed forces, will be his successor.

Amid turgid praise of the one-party socialist system beneath a banner with portraits of Ernesto "Che" Guevara, Karl Marx, and Vladimir Lenin, the platform declared "the party is in a better position today than ever to perfect its role as society's guide."

The embargo will prove its worth when Castro loses power, Rep. Díaz-Balart believes. He says that with no access to the American market, Castro's successor will be forced to accept U.S. conditions for lifting the embargo: legalizing political activity and providing for free elections. "The embargo is the only reason the provisional government will respect the Cuban people," Díaz-Balart says.

"There is a huge thirst for knowing God, and this will help in ushering in a democratic transition," says Palaez, the recent refugee.

Renovating Cuba physically will very likely be easier than renewing the country sonnel of Cuban origin has intercessory prayer as its first line of defense.

The council's goal is a peaceful transition to democracy, which will include assisting Cuban military leadership in the post-Castro era to become answerable to a government freely elected by Cubans. "This goal must and will be accomplished free of hate or revenge and in the spirit of understanding, reconciliation, cooperation, and justice," says the 65-year-old Oliva, who graduated from the Cuban Military Academy in 1954 and came to the United States in 1960 to assist in military operations against the Castro government. He participated in the Bay of Pigs as the second-in-command of exile invasion forces.

"Through faith in Jesus Christ, and with his grace and peace, reunification can be achieved in Cuba," Oliva says. "We consider the Cuban armed forces the only element that can accelerate the transition of democracy in Cuba."

PRAYING FOR THE DAY:

Many exiles are praying for that day. "I don't want to die before I see Cuba free again," says Miami pastor Vera. "I am ready to go back to Cuba to preach the gospel."

Regardless of whether the transition is peaceful or swift,

Cuba's Christians will be in a stronger position than when Castro ushered in the 1959 revolution.

Despite economic distress, international politics, and domestic repression, evangelical Protestants are proving to be faithful.

After his encounters with a bear and a mock firing squad, Eliezer Veguilla is in the United States working with Baptist World Alliance, Trans World Radio, and Open Doors with Brother Andrew. His 67-year-old father, Leoncilo—who spent nearly six years in prison beginning in 1965 as one of 48 Baptist pastors indicted for alleged ties to the CIA—is now president of the Western Baptist Convention of Cuba and Baptist Theological Seminary in Havana. "I'm not afraid anymore of prison," Leoncilo Veguilla told CT. "I remain in Cuba because God is with me to the end."

Missionaries who are ready to mobilize when the country opens need to remember that persecution has a way of vitalizing faithful believers. "We don't need to take Christ to Cuba," says Open Doors' Luna. "Christ has been there all along."

Full house: The tight quarters of the Church of Paul at the Assembly of God congregation in Sagua de Tanámo in eastern Cuba is a common sight because most new congregations must meet in residential buildings.

spiritually. Vera says Cubans have suffered profound damage inside their souls, and much bitterness and hatred extend toward the Castro regime: 50,000 people have been killed by firing squads for refusing to conform to communism; 500,000 have been religious or political prisoners.

"When Castro falls from the scene there will be a bloodbath," predicts exiled Seventh-day Adventist pastor Noble Alexander (see "Bittersweet Cuban Memories," p. 24). "There are lots of people with pent-up anger. I know thousands who have been killed."

In a real sense, what happens with the military could determine Cuba's future. While secret police and neighborhood Communist committees are "deeply involved in daily oppression," Díaz-Balart says the armed forces have remained aloof from the repression.

The Cuban-American Military Council in Washington, D.C., is trying to support any efforts of Cuban armed forces to break ties with Castro. Founded last year by retired general Erneido A. Oliva, the organization of nearly 1,000 military per-

WANTED:

A New Pro-life Strategy

Twenty-five years after Roe, and 37 million abortions later, we have to admit we are losing the fight.

FREDERICA MATHEWES-GREEN

January 22 marks a grim anniversary: 25 years since Roe v. Wade legalized abortion. A generation has passed since the first wave of unborn children fell, and the accumulation of each year's toll totals nearly 37 million. During those years one child was aborted for approximately every three born. Their names would fill the Vietnam Veterans' Memorial wall over 700 times.

Abortion has been a disaster, first for the children who died and second for those who survived to grieve a lost child, grandchild, or sibling. It has damaged us all. How can we even measure the spiritual cost levied on a country that pronounces the killing of its own children a celebrated right? It is tempting to avoid thinking about it, and when we do think of it, it is tempting to stew in helpless fury.

Avoidance and fury—neither response has pushed us forward. As a movement, the pro-life cause has stopped. We are stuck, mired, at an impasse. We have had small gains and small losses, but the bottom line is the same: 1.5 million abortions a year. I suggest we use this morbid anniversary as an opportunity to reassess our strategy.

BECOMING LISTENERS

The pro-life movement has succeeded in keeping people uncomfortable with abortion but not in translating discomfort into a firm will to oppose it. That is why I have adopted the unconventional approach of listening more carefully to the objections to our cause.

I have a personal interest in conversation between the opposing sides: I myself have championed both positions. Back in my college days I was your basic bad-tempered, male-bashing, hairy-legged women's libber, actively pro-abortion. Abortion, I believed, was essential to liberation. Women would not be able to enjoy the same success as their male counterparts unless they, too, could be unhampered by pregnancy and childrearing.

Then, in 1976, a few years after Roe, I read an essay in Esquire magazine titled "What I Saw at the Abortion Clinic." In it surgeon and essayist Richard Selzer described watching a 19-week abortion by an injection procedure no longer in use. He described the abortionist sliding the needle of the syringe into the woman's belly, and then, he writes, "I see something other than what I expected here . . . it is the hub of the needle that is in the woman's belly that has jerked. First to one side. Then to the other side. Once more it wobbles, is tugged, like a fishing line nibbled by a sunfish."

The image horrified him, as it did me. I had never considered that the being in the uterus was more than a blob of tissue, that it could be a human life that wanted to go on living. Selzer concludes his essay: "Whatever else is said in abortion's defense, the vision of that other defense will not vanish from my eyes. And it has happened that you cannot reason with me now. For what can language do against the truth of what I saw?"

The truth of what he saw affected me deeply. I could no longer say that abortion was right—and yet, somehow, I couldn't jump on the anti-abortion bandwagon. I knew that unplanned pregnancy could wreak havoc in a woman's life. The dilemma seemed irresolvable.

I eventually worked my way out of this dilemma, but that is why we must listen carefully to pro-choicers in order to understand their reasoning and, we hope, break through the deadlock.

For several years I have participated in pro-life/pro-choice dialogues, and I now serve on the national steering committee of an umbrella organization that unites grassroots dialogues, the Common Ground Network for Life and Choice. A dialogue usually will begin when members of a community grow weary of miscommunication and hostility and want to get people together on neutral ground just to talk. More ambitious goals may emerge after trust has been built up, but in many cities, "just talking" is all that is accomplished. Thus, Common Ground (CG) is not for every temperament; many will find the lack of concrete action frustrating.

Those who enjoy it, however, will reap several benefits. In a typical small group, moderated by a trained facilitator, a pro-lifer can describe what she believes and why, and what life experiences have formed that belief. Pro-choicers may ask clarifying questions, and then they are asked to restate what the pro-lifer believes to assure that the sentiment has been properly understood. They are not permitted to criticize or try to convince her that she's wrong.

In return, the pro-lifer assumes the same role as listener to pro-choicers and gains new insight into the thinking behind this position. For example, I have learned that while most people are pro-life because of the central conviction that abortion kills babies, pro-choicers can harbor a broad range of reasons for their belief. For some it is the fear that "unwanted" children will be abused; for others it is the specter of deaths from illegal abortion; still others may be concerned about overpopulation. I learned that a pro-life approach that insists "It's a baby!" may be answering a question none are asking and missing the questions they are.

In either case, knowing that they have been truly heard is a healing experience.

CG gives an opportunity to hear and be heard, educates pro-lifers on the real concerns that need to be addressed, and demystifies the "bad guys," turning them into real individuals. If these "bad guys" are our enemies, CG gives an opportunity to love our enemies in a safe and respectful setting.

Formal dialogues like these are not intended to be opportunities for persuasion. Nor is CG aimed at negotiating a compromise, though there is always a hope that unexpected areas of agreement may emerge—like the unexpected consensus that resulted in a position paper issued jointly soon after CG's founding, supporting increased awareness of adoption.

Both sides of this debate are plagued with distorted impressions of what the other side believes. This venue helps overturn those assumptions. One pro-choice friend recently said, "I always thought pro-lifers only wanted to shore up the patriarchy and oppress women, but sometimes I think you really do care about babies." I was shocked; I thought pro-choicers believed we only cared about babies (arguing that we didn't support pregnant women). Likewise, I've found the caricature of pro-choicers as child-sacrifice devotees to be wildly off-base. Many are deeply troubled about the death of the unborn but fear some worse catastrophe if abortion is outlawed. The CG dialogues help clear away misunderstandings. They don't promise we will agree, but they help us arrive at genuine, even respectful, disagreement.

BECOMING PERSUADERS

After we listen, then we persuade. Persuasion needs to become the main strategy for pursuing the pro-life cause. While CG serves to advance the discussion between warring camps, it does little to persuade advocates on either side to "cross over." That is better suited for when you have coffee with a friend over your kitchen table.

The first step in adopting the persuasion model may sound surprising: Put the question of making abortion illegal on the back burner. I believe abortion should be illegal because it is violence against the smallest members of our human family. But one of the reasons we're stuck in a deadlock is because political posturing has overwhelmed the moral discussion. The abortion issue has become something like a football game where yards gained by one side are by necessity yards lost by the other, and neither side is ever going to be willing to give up the fight. This polarization makes it less likely that we can arrive at a resolution; and without resolution, consensus, and peace on this issue, there will be no lasting protection for the unborn. Even a great victory, like an amendment to the Constitution explicitly protecting unborn life, would immediately be attacked by our opponents. They would not rest until they tore it down, just as we haven't rested in combating Roe v. Wade for 25 years. A deeper agreement must be reached before legal justice can be permanently won.

These are my recommendations for advancing a pro-life position that persuades.

First, the pro-life side has had but one simple message: "It's a baby!" In season and out of season, through weeks and years and decades, we have persisted in saying that the life in the womb was a human child, showing sonograms, repeating that the heartbeat begins at 21 days, declaring that every third child dies from abortion.

This is an effective message. It is the message that converted me. It is the most significant argument we have to convince and galvanize, and for that reason I uphold it as the primary factor in a persuasion stance. But it carries a cautionary proviso: The "It's a baby!" message, used alone, can backfire.

WHAT WOMEN WANT

When reiterating that "It's a baby!" the listener is likely to balance the scale: Yes, but women still want abortions. So the second point to make in the persuasion model is to challenge that line of argumentation, asserting, instead, that abortion hurts women.

It is important to press the point—in what sense does a woman want this? No one saves up, hoping one day to have an abortion. It costs hundreds of dollars, money anyone would surely prefer to found it difficult to cope with daily life. "They told her that it would give her control of her body," he wrote. "But what kind of tradeoff is that, to gain control of your body and lose control of your mind?" The cruel irony is that abortion has been presented as something that would set a woman free.

This brings to mind the gypsy in Verdi's opera Il Trovatore. Outraged by the count's cruel injustice, she stole his infant son and, in a crazed act of vengeance, flung him into the fire. Or so she thought. For, in turning around, she discovered the count's son lay safe on the ground behind her; it was her own son she had thrown into the flames. Abortion can present itself as glittering liberty, a defiant way to cast off the shackles of injustice. That illusion lasts only until you realize who it was that you threw into the flames.

So the second point to make when trying to persuade is that abortion hurts women; it does not deliver on its promise to liberate them.

THE PRACTICAL QUESTION

Once we get people to recognize that abortion both kills babies and hurts women, we can then pose the practical question: How could we live without it?

Abortion is part of a complex machine of interlocking social realities, linked to expectations about women's sexual availability, men's freedom from responsibility, and women's duty to be economically self-supporting. The pressure of these social forces cannot be minimized: they create a demand for 4,000 abortions every day, making it the most frequently performed medical procedure.

Pro-lifers need to think beyond the single goal of making abortion illegal. People "in the middle" on this issue imagine that, if all the clinics were padlocked tomorrow, we'd just see 4,000 women pounding on the doors and crying. What needs to change in order for this ravenous demand to be quelled?

Speaking very broadly, there are two problems to solve to advance the case that we can live without abortion. The first is preventing unplanned pregnancies in the first place, and the second is giving women support when they do become pregnant so they will opt not to abort.

Our friends on the other side are also very interested in preventing pregnancy, and so they put much faith in contraception. Contraceptives became broadly available in the early sixties, and forms of "sex education" appeared even before that. Contraception is not a new idea. The

I've found the caricature of pro-choicers as child-sacrifice devotees to be wildly off-base. Dialogues help clear away misunderstandings.

In the first place, the unhappily pregnant woman who hears us describing her beautiful precious baby might stir up vestiges of childhood sibling rivalry: "They like the baby better than me." She gets a pretty clear picture: she and her baby are at odds, and we're on her baby's side. Who's on her side? Abortion advocates. When she turns to the embrace of those sympathetic arms she takes her baby with her.

Also, the "It's a baby!" message alone strikes the muddled middle as failing to take seriously the woman's plight. Our apparent willingness to dismiss those difficulties as "inconvenience" strikes many as either callous or wildly naive.

Additionally, our opponents interpret this appeal as personal attacks on them. When we say, "Abortion is an immoral choice because it kills a baby," they hear, "People who favor abortion are immoral people." I had long wondered why, at debates, I would attack abortion, and my opponent would not defend abortion but attack me.

I came to realize that the "It's a baby!" message, important as it is, does not offer all the solutions we'd hoped it would, and in some instances, creates more misunderstanding. It is a baby, and that ought to be the first point in presenting the pro-life position persuasively. But the conversation needs to move beyond that point.

spend elsewhere. The procedure itself is physically unpleasant, humiliating, and often painful. Do we really believe that women want this?

Beyond that, the procedure does not heal a physical problem but subverts a healthy, normal process. We get confused by the fact that doctors perform it; usually doctors are called in when a natural process goes wrong. But just as our bodies are made to breathe and digest food, women's bodies are designed to sustain a pregnancy and deliver a baby. It is a delicately balanced ecology, and when something disrupts it as violently as abortion does, it is not surprising that damage can result.

Some studies have shown the rates of postabortion miscarriage, ectopic pregnancy, and sterility rising sharply. More recently, connections have been suggested between abortion and breast cancer.

Women don't want abortions. They are expensive, awkward, humiliating, painful, and potentially dangerous. And we have not yet considered the most compelling effect: abortion breaks a woman's heart. At some level, she knows it is her own child who is dying, a son or daughter who looks as much like her as any she will carry full term.

I once received a letter from a man whose wife had an abortion; afterward, he said, she drifted into depression and use of condoms, in particular, has been touted as nearly a patriotic act. People are neither ignorant about contraception nor unaware of where to get it. Yet the rate of abortion remains near 1.5 million a year. Whatever else all this educating and contraceptive-pushing is doing, it's not bringing down the abortion rate.

When sex occurs between two people who have no lasting commitment to each other, a resulting pregnancy is likely to be "unwanted." Recovering an ethic of commitment-based sexuality will mean rediscovering the value of chastity before marriage. The True Love Waits movement is a good example of how this new sexual ethic can be held up and encouraged.

But for the woman who is already pregnant, vows to work for sex education, contraception, and chastity before marriage offer cold comfort. When I was writing Real Choices: Listening to Women, Looking for Alternatives to Abortion (Conciliar Press, 1997), I spent a year studying the problems of pregnancy, seeking to discover the reasons most women choose abortion. I expected to find practical problems heading the list: financial needs, child-care woes, pressure to drop out of school. Yet after reviewing several studies and conducting my own, no clear pattern emerged.

But when I spoke with groups of postabortion women, a nearly unanimous consensus appeared. Women had abortions, in nearly every case, because of relationships. Most often it was to please the father of the child, who was pressuring for abortion. (In a couple of cases, the woman spoke of lying on the abortion table praying her husband would burst in and say, "Stop, I changed my mind!") The second most common reason was pressure from a parent, most often the girl's mother.

In the vast majority of cases, I found a woman is most likely to choose abortion in order to please or protect people that she cares about. Often she discovers too late that there is another person to whom she has an obligation: her own unborn child. The grief that follows abortion springs from the conviction that, in a crisis, this relationship was fatally betrayed.

Supporting women with unplanned pregnancies means continuing what pregnancy-care centers have been doing all along: providing housing, medical care, clothing, counseling, and so forth. But we should also be paying attention to becoming a steadfast friend (this is more important than any material help we can give) and to doing whatever we can to repair relationships in the family circle.

Rather than dismiss the baby's father as a cad, we should explore whether marriage is a possibility. He is, after all, the one appointed by God to provide for and protect mother and child. "Shotgun" marriages have a higher rate of success than expected: in one study, 50 percent of black teen marriages to legitimize a pregnancy were still intact 10 years later. (With a national divorce rate of 50 percent, their batting is average.) White teen couples did better: 75 percent were still together 10 years later. If a marriage fails, there is the financial benefit of child support from the father. Sixty-four percent of divorced and separated mothers receive child-support payments; for women who never married, that rate is only 20 percent.

At a recent conference of crisis-pregnancy centers I was told that there is no brochure a counselor can give a prospective dad that challenges him to accept the responsibility of fatherhood. This time next year I'd like for there to be a dozen.

Pregnancy-care centers can also help improve relationships with parents. The Pregnancy Aid Center in Greenbelt, Maryland, will go with a girl to break the news to her parents, meeting them on neutral ground, like a restaurant. If adoption is one of the options included when parents are involved with the girl in discussing abortion alternatives, the girl is six times more likely to make that choice.

In thinking about the best resolution to unplanned pregnancy, care-center staffers must avoid the temptation to encourage the girl toward single-parenting. This may appeal to her emotionally, but the overwhelming evidence is that it is devastating to children, contributing strongly to poor school performance, delinquency, and another generation of unwed mothering. The mother also finds herself in financial troubles that she may never fully rise above; she is less likely to finish school or to marry. The mother should be encouraged to consider either marriage to the baby's father or adoption.

AGAINST THE LAW?

These three points—abortion kills babies, it hurts women, we can live without it—summarize an approach to the abortion debate that can be effective and persuasive. It is important to note that none of these arguments mentions God. None uses religious or biblical citations to carry its point.

I find that it is nearly always ineffective to use religious arguments with people who are not religious. When you say, "God says abortion is wrong," they don't slap their foreheads and exclaim, "By golly, you're right! I never thought of that!" Instead, they think, "Oh—you're one of those." Whatever you say next will be dismissed.

When these three points are covered, listeners will often say, "I agree with you; I just don't think it should be illegal."

Since there is no present opportunity to make abortion illegal anyway, when the topic does come up, let's avoid the temptation to let the conversation get hijacked into a polarizing discussion that offers no practical application. A more realistic goal for pro-life advocates is to bring about, through both active listening and gentle persuasion, a gradual dawning of the conviction that we can live without abortion. Eventually that may result in a cultural consensus to make it illegal once more.

So our ultimate goal, in all of this reevaluation, remains the same: to end legal and social acquiescence to this atrocity. In America there is an irreducible core of laws that we could not live without, without which we would have barbarism. These are the laws against violence—child abuse, rape and murder, spouse-battering. These laws are sometimes the only thing that stand between the small and weak and the strong and powerful. And abortion laws are that kind of law. Unborn children are the smallest members in our human family, and they deserve that protection.

We have 25 years of evidence of what happens when legal protection is repealed: these children are being killed at the rate of 4,000 a day. Humanitarianism, goodwill, and compassion are not bubbling up from some mysterious source to protect them; only the force of law can do that. It will do it imperfectly, to be sure; but these children deserve whatever protection we can win them.

Opponents of abortion laws tend to envision a perfect society where women are empowered and free, arguing that a few legally permitted abortions (37 million?) is the price we must pay to get there. But can a just society really be founded on the death of children? How many deaths can we tolerate in pursuit of this utopian vision?

ROE v. MCCORVEY

What made "Roe" betray the pro-choice cause?

GARY THOMAS

Norma McCorvey could outcuss the crassest men; she could outdrink many of the Dallas taverns' regulars; and she was known for her hot temper. When pro-lifers called her a murderer, she called them worse. When people held up signs of aborted fetuses, Norma spit in their faces.

She had a reputation to protect, after all. As the plaintiff in the infamous Supreme Court case Roe v. Wade, Norma's life was inextricably tied up with abortion.

Though she had never had one, abortion was the sun around which Norma's life orbited. She once told a reporter, "This issue is the only thing I live for. I live, eat, breathe, think everything about abortion."

Then the fiery pro-life group Operation Rescue moved in next door.

AN UNLIKELY FRIENDSHIP

Operation Rescue has had a tumultuous history. Founded by Randall Terry, OR made international headlines in the late eighties by staging "sit-ins" at abortion clinics across the country. Almost immediately, the pro-life movement was split between those who supported OR and those who thought they were doing more harm than good. A few people stood in the middle, but not many.

Terry stepped down from OR in 1990, and his successor, Keith Tucci, followed suit a few years later. Flip Benham became director in 1994. By this time, federal legislation and extreme penalties for a first-time offense made the well-attended rescues largely a thing of the past. OR's influence was clearly on the wane, but their move next door to Norma's abortion clinic, A Choice for Women, would change that overnight.

Norma called Flip Benham, the brash and bold OR leader, Flip "Venom." Flip called Norma "responsible for the deaths of 35 million children." They were supposed to be sworn enemies, but due to the persistence of a local real estate agent, they became next-door neighbors whose offices shared a common wall in a building off the LBJ highway in the Lake Highlands area of North Dallas.

After OR moved to this location, the Dallas police settled down to an almost hourly routine. The bleep-bleep of a police siren and flashing blue lights could be heard and seen several times a day for the next few months as the two sides clashed out in the parking lot.

Occasionally, the clashes would collapse into conversation. During one friendly exchange, Norma goaded Flip, "You need to go to a good Beach Boys concert."

"Miss Norma," Flip answered, "I haven't been to a Beach Boys concert since 1976."

The innocuous response shook Norma. "All at once," she says, "Flip became human to me. Before, I had thought of [Flip] as a man who did nothing but yell at abortion clinics and read his Bible. The thought that he was a real person—a guy who had once even gone to a Beach Boys concert—never occurred to me. Now that it had, I saw him in a new light." As they chatted outside on the bench between their offices, however, Flip began sharing some stories of his past, and out of this vulnerability an unlikely friendship was born.

Other OR volunteers also began reaching out to Norma. In return, Norma explained her crystals and book of Runes. It wasn't exactly Elijah and the prophets of Baal, but in both minds it was clearly a case of "may the true God win."

A MOTHER'S HEART

As Norma's mind was challenged to consider the truth of the gospel, God began working on her heart through a seven-year-old girl named Emily, the daughter of OR volunteer Ronda Mackey. Quite understandably, Norma had difficulty relating to children. She had given birth to three, all of whom had been placed for adoption (one of them against Norma's will). And because she worked in an abortion clinic, Norma was fearful of bonding with anyone so young. "It was part of my denial," she explains. "When you know what is happening to the children behind closed doors, it's difficult to become attached to them outside."

Emily's blatant affection, frequent hugs, and direct pursuit disarmed Norma. The little girl's interest was all the more surprising considering Emily made it very clear that her acceptance of Norma wasn't an acceptance of Norma's lifestyle. Early on in their relationship, Norma explained to Emily, "I like kids and wouldn't let anyone hurt little kids," to which Emily responded, "Then why do you let them kill the babies at the clinic?"

This childlike innocence cut open Norma's heart. Norma wasn't won over by compelling, intellectual arguments. While the OR adults targeted Norma's mind, Emily went straight for the heart. Over time, Emily began to personify the issue of abortion—especially when Ronda broke down and told Norma that Emily had almost been aborted.

Ronda was engaged when Emily was conceived, and nobody was very happy about the pregnancy. Ronda's future in-laws, her mother, and her fiancé all pressured her to get an abortion during the first trimester. Ronda admits that she gave abortion serious consideration, at one point even saying she would pursue it. Yet memories of a high-school friend's emotional devastation following an abortion strengthened Ronda's resolve to let Emily live.

Shortly after Ronda told Norma this story, the two were shopping with Ronda's girls. Norma, who has a decidedly mystical bent to her nature, was stunned when she saw Ronda's bumper sticker, "Abortion Stops a Beating Heart," which has a vivid, red heart on the side.

Norma saw Emily's heart in that sticker; it just about destroyed her when she realized that "my law" (as she once fondly referred to Roe v. Wade) made it legal to snuff out young Emily's life. Norma asked to be taken home immediately, but later that afternoon she spent over an hour on the phone with Ronda and their deep friendship was solidified.

Norma was forever changed by this experience. For her, abortion was no longer an "abstract right," because it had a face in a little girl named Emily.

BLUE COLLAR, IVY LEAGUE CLASH

Emotionally, Norma was ready for a change. Her alienation from the abortion movement was practically legendary, even before she became a Christian. Most of the abortion advocacy movement was afraid of her blue collar, tough talking, and unrefined ways. Norma was raised as a poor Louisiana girl who spent a good part of her childhood in reform schools. She ran away from home when she was ten and spent several decades supporting herself with odd jobs—as a carnival barker, a waitress, a bartender, apartment cleaner, construction worker, and the like.

Norma spoke her mind, and the abortion movement's leadership kept as wide a hedge around her as possible. Norma wasn't asked to address the huge 1989 march in Washington, nor was she even invited to the 1993 twentieth anniversary celebration of Roe v. Wade.

Such a blatant snub had understandable roots. She frequently caught abortion clinic directors off guard by openly questioning the morality of some (particularly late-term) abortions. And she had experienced a raucous falling out with her attorney, Sarah Weddington, whom Norma believed had "dumped" her.

The falling out with Weddington hurt Norma the most. Explains Norma, "I was chosen [to sign the affidavit] because Sarah Weddington needed someone who would sign the paper and fade into the background, never coming out and always keeping silent. Ideally, in their minds, I would have just stayed quiet, gotten on with my life, and quietly suffered, eventually committing suicide. I would have been much more useful to them, not to mention famous, if I had died young. As long as I was alive, I was a danger. I might speak out. I could be unpredictable. And I was."

As Norma's friendship with Benham drew national attention, Norma started receiving even more ridicule from her abortion advocate "friends." She soon found herself in the uncomfortable situation of being increasingly alienated from those on her side of the issue and befriended by her alleged enemies. Before long, Norma started coming to work simply so she could talk to the rescuers. She was scheduled to work just two days a week, but, she says, "I couldn't wait that long to get one of Emily's hugs."

Norma felt torn apart by the fact that four days a week she and Ronda—not to mention the other rescue volunteers—were best friends, while on the other three days—when abortions were actually performed—they were bitter enemies.

During one abortion-day confrontation, Norma charged up to Anne Hollacher, an OR volunteer who was holding a picket sign, and yelled, "You can't park on the same place you're picketing. Move the car!"

"No, I'm not moving my car," Anne responded. "This is our parking lot, too."

Norma called Anne every name she could think of, which was usually enough to make the toughest protesters wilt, but Anne maintained her composure. When Norma saw that Anne wouldn't budge, she spit in her face.

Anne smiled.

Norma was furious. "How dare you look at me like that?" she screamed. "How dare you smile at me?"

Anne politely wiped the spit off her face with her sleeve. "Jesus loves you, and so do I," she said. "And I forgive you."

It would have taken several clinic workers to pull Norma away from Anne except that Norma suddenly experienced severe chest pains and had to remove herself from the scene to catch her breath.

Five minutes later, Ronda and the girls showed up, the girls eager to give Norma a hug, and Norma was overwhelmed by such a generous display of love after she had nursed so bitter a hatred.

The confusion inside Norma became intense. She couldn't stand the thought of losing Ronda's friendship, and she wasn't about to let Emily be taken out of her life. But how long could they maintain a friendship when abortion stood between them?

THE LITTLE EVANGELIST

"Miss Norma," Emily cooed one afternoon, "it would be so-o-o cool if you would come to church with us."

Norma didn't want to disappoint Emily directly, so she answered, "Well, Emily, we'll have to be cool another time. I can't go to church with you this weekend."

If Norma didn't want to offend Emily by an abrupt denial, she needn't have worried. Not about to give up, Emily kept asking Norma to come with her to church.

Finally, Norma said yes—not out of a sudden need for God in her life, but because she was tired of telling Emily no.

Ronda was skeptical, but when they went to pick up Norma, she was dressed and ready to go. One sermon was all Norma needed. Pastor Morris Sheats of Hillcrest Church ended his sermon with a compelling evangelistic call, asking, "Is anyone here tired of living a sinner's life?" and immediately Norma felt overwhelmed by her need to respond.

"How could I say no?" Norma recalls. "I had been tired of it for years, but it was the only life I knew!" Norma cautiously of my sin pushing down on my shoulders," Norma remembers.

raised her hand, then opened her eyes "and looked up to see if that really was my hand raised up high. It was. I couldn't believe it."

Ronda recalls Norma repeating over and over, "I just want to undo all the evil I've done in this world. I'm so sorry, God. I'm so, so sorry. As far as abortion is concerned, I just want to undo it. I want it all to just go away."

Finally, Norma stopped crying and broke into the biggest smile of her life. "I no longer felt the pressure of my sin pushing down on my shoulders," she remembers. "The release was so quick that I felt like I could almost float outside."

When Norma's conversion became public knowledge, she spoke openly to reporters about still supporting legalized pregnancy termination in the first trimester. The media were quick to use this to downplay the seriousness of Norma's conversion, saying she typified the "general ambivalence" of our culture over abortion.

But a few weeks after her conversion, Norma was sitting in OR's offices when she noticed a fetal development poster. Explains Norma, "The progression was so obvious, the eyes were so sweet. . . . It hurt my heart, just looking at them."

Norma ran outside. "Finally, it dawned on me. 'Norma,' I said to myself, 'They're right.' I had worked with pregnant women for years. I had been through three pregnancies and deliveries myself. I should have known. Yet something in that poster made me lose my breath. I kept seeing the picture of that tiny, ten-week-old embryo, and I said to myself, 'That's a baby!' It's as if blinders just fell off my eyes and I suddenly understood the truth—that's a baby!"

Norma felt "crushed" under the truth of this realization. "I had to face up to the awful reality. Abortion wasn't about 'products of conception.' It wasn't about 'missed periods.' It was about children being killed in their mother's wombs. All those years, I was wrong."

A NEW LIFE

Two years after her conversion, Norma left Operation Rescue. After a grueling 11-day encounter in San Diego in 1996, she began having serious reservations about whether she was "cut out" for the intense confrontations that often face rescue volunteers. She also had a difficult time operating under Benham's leadership, eventually believing that they made better friends than co-workers. Because of her loyalty and affection for the people involved in rescue, however, it took her until the early summer of 1997 to complete the break.

Ronda Mackey has joined Norma in leaving OR, and the two women have set up a ministry to handle Norma's increasing invitations to speak and appear at pro-life events. Instead of being under the OR umbrella, Norma now reports regularly to the pastors at Hillcrest Church.

Norma's conversion is one for the ages. The timing was precise—OR was next door to Norma's clinic for less than a year, but it wasn't until Norma had a regenerated heart that the truth of what abortion does could find a place in her intellect. Once that truth took hold, there was no turning back.

"I'm one hundred percent sold out to Jesus and one hundred percent pro-life," she likes to say. "No exceptions. No compromise."

Only Way

Answering the argument that all religions are more or less true.

DANIEL B. CLENDENIN

Will my mother be in heaven?" ten-year-old Lexi asked her adoptive parents. Lexi wanted to know whether her birth mother, who was from India and had died without ever having heard the gospel, would be saved. Lexi had an obvious personal reason for asking this question, but it is one that most Christians encounter at some point: Can anyone be saved who has not heard and accepted the gospel?

Recently I attended a meeting at my son's middle school where parents were introduced to sex-education materials for our children. There are students in this school from over 30 countries, composing a mosaic of the world's religions. It occurred to me that most of those people from other religions who sat beside me that night maintain high sexual standards that are far closer to my own views than are those of the "average" secular American. I felt strangely positive about and even grateful for the presence of believers of other faiths in my community.

These two encounters with other religions pose two different challenges—one theological, the other political. Lexi's question poses the issue of theological pluralism and is religious in nature: Is there truth in other religions? Can an adherent of a non-Christian religion be saved? Lexi's question is foreboding, for the very heart of the gospel is at stake in how we answer.

The other challenge of world religions is cultural pluralism, and the issues raised are political: How can people of widely divergent faiths live peacefully together in society? My sex-education experience filled me with gratitude about the presence of non-Christian, religious allies on a crucial moral issue.

How do we sort out these questions?

MANY GODS, MANY LORDS

A smorgasbord of religions is not new. It is precisely what we find in Scripture. The radical monotheism of Israel (Deut. 4:35) developed amidst Egyptian polytheism. Who could forget Elijah's fiery encounter on Mount Carmel with Jezebel's prophets of Baal and Asherah to determine the one true God (1 Kings 18:17–40)?

In the New Testament era, Paul proclaimed that Christ alone provided the only true gospel (Gal. 1:6–9); he alone was the only worthy Lord among the "many 'gods' and many 'lords'" (1 Cor. 8:5, NIV) of Greek and Roman polytheism. At Ephesus, home to the cult of the goddess Diana, Paul provoked a riot when he declared that "'gods made with human hands are not gods'" (Acts 19:23–26, NRSV).

Yet, while the idea of a cornucopia of human religiosity is very old, our awareness of its challenge to Christian faith is rather new. We are in a fundamentally different religious environment from what our grandparents or even our parents encountered. We can no longer think and speak in terms confined to Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish categories. The world we live in has changed.

One reason is immigration. In 1994 there were about 22.5 million foreign-born people in America. In my home state of California, for example, one-quarter of our residents are foreign-born. My son's middle-school teacher had 11 nationalities in a class of 30 students. While America has always been a nation of immigrants, what is new is where today's immigrants come from. More and more they come from culturally non-Christian nations, and they bring with them the religions of the world. Our nation is becoming less and less a religiously homogeneous country. Islam will replace Judaism as America's second-largest religion in about 20 years; already 3 to 5 million Buddhists live in America; and Hindu temples dot the landscapes not only of Chicago and New York, but also of Aurora, Illinois, and Springfield, Virginia.

Living in religious isolation is almost impossible. Most people can name colleagues they work with every day who are of other religions. Through this interaction we discover that people of other faiths are very much like us. They laugh at weddings and cry at funerals, are as moral as we are, and carry the same hopes, fears, and dreams as we do.

The evangelistic efforts of some world religions have also heightened their visibility. Who has not been approached by a Hare Krishna devotee passing out literature in an airport? At a Stanford University meeting of campus ministers, we were asked to identify our intended audience and scope of activity—to which a Muslim campus minister responded with a bashful chuckle, "the entire world."

Over the last hundred years, many departments of theology and philosophy have encouraged nonjudgmental attitudes toward other religions, precluding the judgment that one faith is superior to another. Some people now insist that "right action" (ethics) is the criterion of "true religion," whereas "right doctrine" (orthodoxy) is divisive. And so adherents of other religions are viewed as potential partners in actions of ethical goodwill rather than as lost people who need to be saved.

Radical relativity has invaded our cultural consciousness. Any absolute claim is disdained as idolatrous, illusory, and bigoted. Choice in and of itself is deemed good, and the only choice that cannot be tolerated is one like ours: namely, that some beliefs are true and good while others are false and wrong.

Pressure to rethink the relationship between Christianity and the world religions poses some very painful questions. A main one is the suspicion that one's religious identity is really an accident of geography, so that people of Kuwait are primarily Muslim, those in Japan Shinto, people in India Hindu, and so on. Are we not Christians simply because we were born and raised in America where, until recently, the Christian faith has dominated?

The vast majority of people who have ever lived and are living today are not Christian. Does it make sense, therefore, to believe that God wants to save people only through Christ? Exact figures are hard to come by, but even rough estimates are disturbing. In A.D. 100, about a half percent of the world population was Christian, in A.D. 1000 about 19 percent, and today—after 2,000 years of missionary effort—only about 30 percent of the world identifies itself as Christian. What can we say about the eternal destiny of this vast horde who never named the name of Christ?

Taken together, these factors help to explain our new awareness of a very old challenge: The vast diversity of world religions pose competing claims and offer "gospels" other than that of Christ alone as Savior and Lord.

DAVE BARTRUFF

Only about 30 percent of the world is Christian. What can we

BEDROCK TRUTHS

With this pluralistic, religious context in mind, we can begin to craft a Christian response to the world religions by reminding ourselves of five important truths. However we respond to Lexi's question and my public school experience, we must hold fast to these clear truths of Scripture:

First, all God's work is perfect, void of even the faintest tinge of unfairness (Deut. 32:4; Zeph. 3:5). Christians can be absolutely confident about the character of God when we deal with the problem of religions. While denying that all religions are equally valid or that all people will be saved, we remain utterly confident that God will treat every person with perfect love and justice. Elihu stated this most eloquently: "Far be it from God to do evil, from the Almighty to do wrong" (Job 34:10, NIV). For the Christian, it is unthinkable that God will treat any person of any time, place, or religion unfairly. So to Abraham's ancient question, "Will not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. 18:25, NIV), Christians respond with a resounding yes!

Second, Jesus Christ is the definitive and fullest revelation of God. All three major branches of Christianity—Orthodox, Catholic, and Protestant—affirm, in the words of the Nicene-Constan-tinopolitan Creed (A.D. 374), that Jesus Christ was “the only-begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all ages, Light of Light, true God of true God, begotten not made, of one substance with the Father, through whom all things were made.” Our doctrine of natural or general revelation allows us to affirm that God has partially revealed himself in creation, in conscience—and perhaps even in some non-Christian religions. Yet, God has fully and most definitively revealed himself in Christ, who alone will judge all other claims of revelation.

Third, there is no other means to salvation apart from what God provided through Christ’s vicarious and sacrificial death on the cross. As evangelicals we remain committed to the necessary and all-sufficient atoning work of Christ on the cross. This is unquestioned. What is debated among some Christians, including evangelicals, is whether Christ’s atoning work of salvation can be efficacious for people who have not known and accepted this provision of salvation, such as people who lived before Christ, infants who die, mentally challenged people who do not have the intellectual capacity to understand the gospel, and people who have no opportunity to hear the gospel. More on this later.

Fourth, whereas God is infinite and beyond comprehension, we humans are finite and sinful, often far too quick, theologically speaking, to speak of things we don’t understand (Job 42:3). We need to cultivate a measure of theological humility. Humility is not skepticism, agnosticism, or even the refusal to argue for a bold position. Rather, it is the recognition that “as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways and my thoughts than your thoughts” (Isa. 55:9, NIV). Paul was reduced to doxological humility when he marveled at “how unsearchable are his judgments and inscrutable his ways!” (Rom. 11:33, NRSV). It is natural and even good to long for definitive answers to life’s most difficult questions, but some of character of God, the fullness of God’s self-revelation in Christ, the sufficiency of Christ’s atonement for humanity’s sin, and theological humility about what we do not or cannot know, we add the criterion of practical obedience to what we do know—the evangelistic imperative.

How should Christians respond to the world religions? These five affirmations should help us steer a path between saying too much, which could lead to a needlessly harsh position that drives people into radically pluralistic viewpoints, and saying too little, which could lead to denying the uniqueness and normativeness of the gospel.

THE PLURALITIES OF PLURALISM

The term pluralism can function in a variety of ways, and it is important to keep them straight. At one level, pluralism can describe simple demographic facts, the way things are. In this sense, Stanford University is “pluralistic” since there are 24 religious groups on campus that work under the auspices of the university’s Memorial Church. Or again, Singapore is “pluralistic” since it is roughly 41 percent Buddhist, 18 percent Christian, 17 percent Muslim, 17 percent secularist, and 5 percent Hindu. It is a demographic fact that the United States, once a religiously homogeneous country, is rapidly becoming more “pluralistic.” This is simply the way things are.

There are two other meanings of pluralism that have to do with world-views. One of these is theological pluralism, the belief that all religions are more or less able to provide salvation. This is theologically destructive and needs to be refuted.

The other is the belief that political or cultural pluralism (social diversity) is an ideal. I considered my school experience of cultural pluralism as socially positive, good, and to be promoted.

Learning to distinguish between theological and cultural plu-ut the eternal destiny of this vast horde who never named the name of Christ?

our questions will go unanswered—at least in this life.

Even our reading of Scripture gives us cause for theological humility. Evangelicals rightly insist that Scripture is God’s normative self-revelation, but this does not mean that it answers every question we have. The Westminster Confession (1.7) observes that not all things in Scripture are equally clear, nor equally clear to all believers. But through the “due use of ordinary means” (study, prayer, the counsel of others, etc.) we can attain a sufficient if not perfect understanding of all that is necessary for salvation. Although it is sometimes frustrating, we need to remind ourselves that while the Scriptures are infallible, our understanding of them is not, and that a high view of inspiration does not automatically lead to accurate interpretation. Hence, there is reason enough for theological modesty, especially about a matter as nettlesome as the relationship between Christianity and the world religions.

Fifth and finally, we remain under the mandate of the Great Commission to make disciples among every people and nation. Christ himself issued this command four different times (Matt. 28:19–20; Luke 24:45–48; John 20:21; Acts 1:8). Evangelicals must guard against any loss of nerve in proclaiming unapologetically the truth of the gospel. Thus, to confidence about the ralism is essential to developing a Christian view of other religions. All too often we merge and confuse the two. An excellent example of this comes from the Hindu Swami Vivekananda (1863–1902), a prominent participant at the 1893 World’s Parliament of Religions, who proclaimed that he was “proud to belong to a religion that has taught the world both tolerance and universal acceptance. We believe not only in universal toleration, but we accept all religions to be true.” Promoting political toleration and universal suffrage for people of any and all religion is one thing, even a good thing; but believing that all religions are true and lead equally to salvation is quite another matter.

Now we are ready to return to Lexi’s question. To answer her we need to hold two biblical principles together: one, God desires that no one should perish, but rather that every person be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9); and two, Christ alone is the only way to the Father, the only name under heaven by which we can be saved (John 14:6; Acts 4:12).

So are all people not of the Christian faith eternally lost? Here we seem betwixt and between. To answer yes, when roughly 70 percent of today’s world population is non-Christian, seems to cast a dark shadow of doubt over the first truth.

To answer no apparently contradicts the equally clear truth of the second point and cuts the nerve of the missionary imperative to make disciples of all nations (Matt. 28:19–20).

Three centuries ago John Bunyan (1628–88) admitted in his classic autobiography, Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, that the Devil assailed him with questions like these:

How can you tell but that the Turks had as good Scriptures to prove their Mahomet the Saviour, as we have to prove our Jesus is; and could I think that so many ten thousands in so many Countreys and Kingdoms, should be without the knowledge of the right way to Heaven . . . and that we onely, who live but in a corner of the earth, should alone be blessed therewith? Everyone doth think his own Religion rightest, both Jews, and Moors, and Pagans; and how if all our Faith, and Christ, and Scriptures, should be but a think-so too?

Bunyan's language may sound quaint, and Lexi's question to her parents full of childlike innocence, but the force of their perplexities hits us like a karate chop to the back of our theological necks. How should evangelicals who believe that Christ alone is the only way to God respond to the wildly divergent truth claims of the world religions?

In general, Christians have adopted one of three basic paradigms to answer this question, which I will call pluralism, exclusivism, and inclusivism.

THEOLOGICAL PLURALISM

For two hundred years, Christians have defended their worldview against the attacks of atheism that argued all religions are false. How ironic that we now face the opposite extreme, a theological pluralism that claims all religions are true. Theological pluralism is not entirely new, nor is it a single position, although it has been vigorously championed in the last decade by a growing number of prominent scholars. The pluralist agenda has been set by Paul Knitter's landmark volume No Other Name? (1985) and a quoting the Bhagavad Gita (4.11): "Howsoever men may approach me, even so do I accept them; for, on all sides, whatever path they may choose is mine." In other words, the one Divine Reality has many different names.

According to the theological pluralists, people may be savingly related to God through any number of vastly different religions because God is actively revealed more or less equally through all of them. Behind all the wildly divergent human religions, there is some basic, shared core, a universal essence or common denominator that allows us to say that they are all really the same or aiming at the same goal.

Despite the current prestige of theological pluralism, and even its apparent appeal—who would not want to affirm that all religions are equal?—this paradigm contains significant flaws.

First, we have all heard the cliché that "all religions teach the same thing." Is that true? At a superficial level we might answer yes. It would be easy, for example, to document versions of the Golden Rule in a number of otherwise very different religions. But at a deeper level, a universal essence or common denominator is precisely what the world religions do not have. Once we move beyond superficial similarities, we discover that the many religions of the world present to us very different and sometimes contradictory pictures of God and the world.

In his excellent book Dissonant Voices, evangelical philosopher Harold Netland compares the way Hinduism, Buddhism, Islam, and Shinto answer three basic questions: the nature of the religious ultimate, the human predicament, and salvation. What we discover, of course, is that these religions offer radically different perspectives on these basic questions. For example, Islam, like Christianity and Judaism, confesses one creator God as ultimate, whereas a number of different concepts within Buddhism make it hard to locate a single idea for the ultimate. Or again, Shinto is polytheistic whereas Christianity, Islam, and Judaism are monotheistic. To take one more example, in Hinduism and Buddhism the fundamental human problem is not sin against a righteous God, but "rather a profound ignorance, blindness, or confusion

We need to hold two biblical principles together: one, God desires that every person book edited by Knitter and philosopher of religion John Hick entitled The Myth of Christian Uniqueness (1988). Their goal was a radical reconception of traditional Christian beliefs, and in this they more than succeeded.

Despite important differences among its various advocates, theological pluralism entails both a positive and a negative judgment. Negatively, pluralists categorically repudiate the traditional Christian position that Christ is the only way to the Father; they view this as outrageously absurd, chauvinistic, and as morally, politically, and theologically disastrous. According to Hick, "only diehards who are blinded by dogmatic spectacles can persist in such a sublime bigotry." Thus, pluralists sharply reject the idea that any one religion is absolute or normative.

Positively, whereas atheism declares that all religion is false, the pluralist affirms them all as true. The many world religions are all limited but valid human apprehensions of the one, true, infinite Divine Reality. Hick often summarizes his position by regarding the true nature of reality." With differing conceptions of the human predicament, then, the world religions propose differing concepts of "salvation."

Furthermore, to insist that the world religions all make essentially similar claims distorts what they actually do teach and is blatantly patronizing. Imagine how a Muslim or Hindu feels when she is told that the central affirmations of her religion are no different from those of a Christian or Buddhist. As Netland writes, "So long as the meanings of the doctrines within the respective religious communities are preserved, they cannot be jointly accepted without absurdity."

Second, according to the religious pluralists, god or the "Ultimate Real" is in itself unknown and unknowable. All that we do know are the very human and relative religious expressions of this Real, which are accepted as equally valid. Says Hick, the Real remains "forever hidden, beyond the scope of human conception, language, or worship." The world religions then speak symbolically and mythically about the Real, but not literally. But if this is so, why are the pluralists so confident about their own pronouncements about religion? By their own standard, these too are merely relative descriptions of the Unknowable, but in fact, they propose to inform us about the way things “really” are. If the Real is unknown and unknowable, why argue that all the religions are more or less true? Why not argue that they are all false? Or again, why does the pluralist argue that there is only one Ultimate Real? Why not many? In short, in theological pluralism the Real has become an empty referent that has no clearly Teresa’s Sisters of Mercy are any better than the Heaven’s Gate cult; or that David Koresh’s compound at Waco, Texas, was any worse than an Amish community. Simply put, consistent pluralism tolerates the intolerable.

THEOLOGICAL EXCLUSIVISM AND INCLUSIVISM

Evangelicals rightly reject the theological pluralism of Knitter, Hick, and others, while continuing to explore the adequacy of two other theological models of relating to the world religions: exclusivism and inclusivism. Both have their strengths and weaknesses, and both have their advocates within evangelicalism.

Exclusivism has been the historic position of much of the church, and for that reason alone it merits our deepest respect. In its simplest form, exclusivism is a logical claim: When two religions make logically incompatible truth claims, they cannot both be true. For example, some Eastern religions hold that life and death are an endless, recurring cycle, whereas Christians believe that after death comes judgment. To be sure, when we die, one of these views will be proved false. Thus we see how silly it is to claim that “all religions are equally true.”

More important, exclusivism is a theological claim that, in order to be saved, people must intentionally place their faith in Christ alone as the only way to God. Indeed, if Jesus is truly God incarnate, then some form of exclusivism is necessary. Christian exclusivism need not claim that all the beliefs of other religions are false or have no value. We can affirm that non-Christian religions contain some truth. Non-Christian beliefs are rejected only when they contradict clear Christian teaching. Exclusivism finds expression in the classic statements of Origen (c. 185–254) and Cyprian (c. 200–58) that “outside the church there is no salvation.”

In its purest form, an exclusivist would argue that there are no exceptions to the rule that salvation requires an explicit acceptance of Christ’s redemptive work through faith. Evangelicals who tend toward a “hard” exclusivist position include Harold Netland (Dissonant Voices) and D. A. Carson (The Gagging of God).

Many Christians, including some exclusivists, want to make at least some exceptions. It seems likely that some people have been saved exclusively by Christ even though they have not explicitly called upon Christ—for instance, Old Testament saints, infants who die young, and the severely mentally challenged. By analogy, some would add a fourth category of possible exceptions, some people of other religions. This is the inclusivist position.

C. S. Lewis illustrates inclusivism in Mere Christianity when he writes, “We do know that no person can be saved except through Christ; we do not know that only those who know Him can be saved by Him.” In his final Narnia classic, The Last Battle, despite having followed the false god Tash, the pagan Emeth (whose name assignable content, and it is self-contradictory to claim that its own religious world-view is not a contradiction.

Finally, while with atheism it is impossible for a religionist to be right, with theological pluralism it is apparently impossible to be wrong. If the pluralist is correct that all the religions are more or less equally true, then it is impossible to make a mistake, either morally or cognitively. But do we really want to say this? What about the Christian Crusades, Hindu widow burning, female genital mutilation, temple prostitution, or Aztec human sacrifice? Are these religious expressions really as valid as Islamic almsgiving or Buddhist self-denial? Do we not want to distinguish between a religion whose symbol is a stone phallus and a religion whose symbol is a cross?

It seems clear that some religious practices and beliefs are false and evil. But this is precisely what the pluralist cannot say and remain consistent. Without some absolute standard by which to judge, it becomes impossible to say that Mother is the Hebrew word for "truth") is welcomed into the kingdom of Aslan. So in inclusivism, salvation is exclusively by Christ alone and not good works, even though a person has not explicitly called upon Christ. Evangelical inclusivists today include Clark Pinnock (A Wideness in God's Mercy) and John Sanders (No Other Name).

Certainly caution is in order here. We must not assume that God has put us in a position to answer questions beyond the scope of our own personal sphere of obedient responsibility: that is, the fate of those who through no fault of their own do not hear the gospel or because we Christians through no fault of our own were unable to take it to them. J. I. Packer says that "we have no warrant to expect that God will act thus in any single case where the gospel is not known or understood. Therefore our missionary obligation is not one whit diminished by our entertaining this possibility." We do better to redouble our efforts to obey what we do know is clear—the Great Commission—rather than to speculate or worry about what is unclear.

THE CHARGE OF INTOLERANCE—NOT GUILTY

Oddly enough, the theological affirmation that Christ alone is the only way to salvation brings us to the question of cultural pluralism, which was illustrated by my sex-education experience. There is a clear link between the two. Theological pluralists like Hick and Knitter accuse traditional Christians of bigotry and arrogance when we proclaim the exclusivist gospel in the public square. They maintain it is wrong to proselytize and to try to convert people of other religions to Christianity. How should Christians respond to charges of intolerance toward other religions?

One way to address these concerns, as Netland has shown, is to distinguish between several related but different types of toleration. First, there is legal toleration, a tradition championed in the West and painfully absent in many other parts of the world. Legal toleration refers to what we call our First Amendment rights—freedom of speech and press, freedom of and even from religion without compulsion or government interference, protection of minority opinion and dissent, and so on. Social toleration refers to the promotion of attitudes of respect, esteem, humility, modesty, and the like. Christians should always be in the forefront of promoting and protecting both legal and social toleration for all people, regardless of their religious beliefs. This is simply a human right that we all cherish.

Another level of toleration is intellectual, which is the relativist belief that we should accept whatever another person sincerely believes as "true for them." Legal toleration commits us always to protect people's political rights to follow any religion or no religion at all; and social toleration advocates charity toward people who think and believe differently from the way we do; but this does not necessarily commit us to intellectual toleration if that means we should never conclude that a person holds to false ideas and, consequently, try to convince them that they are wrong and should change their views. Vigorous debate can occur in a civil and charitable manner.

The current cultural climate often fails to distinguish legal and social toleration from intellectual toleration so that if you criticize a person's ideas you are charged with bigotry and intolerance toward that person. Proselytizing becomes the worst social sin imaginable. Because of this current climate, evangelicals need to give renewed vigor and attention to promoting cultural pluralism, which encourages the legal and social toleration of a multiplicity of religious voices while vigorously rejecting theological pluralism, which practices intellectual toleration in its claim that salvation is equally accessible through all religions. In other words, we can love those we disagree with (by practicing legal and social toleration) while trying to convince them that they are wrong.

So are we being hypocritical by wanting to protect and promote the rights of people of other faiths while, at the same time, declaring them to be wrong and in need of conversion? No. There are at least three reasons for such a stance.

First is the recognition that legal toleration is just that, the law of the land, and for this we should be thankful. The alternative is some form of totalitarianism. In this sense, all American citizens should enjoy an equal protection of First Amendment rights. Christians should not expect any privileged status. For example, legally mandating a specifically Christian prayer in public schools is not a good idea, whereas supporting the right of an atheist against religious repression is a good idea.

Second, as my sex-education experience indicated, even when we disagree with people theologically, there are often practical reasons to join with them in a moral alliance to resist evil trends in culture.

Third, a Christian anthropology affirms that God has given all people rational minds and free wills that even God honors. Practically speaking, as John Stuart Mill noted in his classic text On Liberty (1859), it is virtually impossible to use any sort of outward force to compel inward conviction. In fact, using compulsion often backfires. Rather, with Paul, we seek to woo people, with all of our passion and persuasion, but never by manipulation or force.

WHY WE WITNESS

Christians should champion political or cultural pluralism but categorically reject theological pluralism in favor of the exclusive work of Christ. Thus, to the other parents of children in my son's seventh grade, I extend grateful partnership for our shared moral concerns, a promise always to honor them with the civil grace that we all cherish, but also the promise of a vigorous discussion about the most important question anyone can ever ask—what must I do to be saved? (Acts 16:30).

To Lexi's question about whether her birth mother would be in heaven, I'd respond with an honest "It's possible" or better, "I don't know." But why then witness to her mother if she might be saved by Christ without calling upon Christ? As Packer suggests, it is impossible for us to know how God is dealing with any given individual who does not know or understand the gospel. The ordinary way of salvation entails an explicit act of faith in Christ, and any exceptions to this are best understood as extraordinary. To be saved, as it were, "by the skin of your teeth" is one thing; but to experience "abundant life" in Christ (John 10:10) in all its fullness requires an explicit knowledge and experience of the gospel in all its depth and breadth. The latter is the better and more sure way to heaven and the one we attach our labors to.

Finally, we witness because we must exercise practical obedience to what God has clearly commanded, even if we do not understand everything. Rather than some flimsy excuse that results in evangelistic timidity, here our theological humility results in a doxological response to God whose ways are sometimes unsearchable (Rom. 11:33–36) but in whom we can certainly trust.

A Different Kind of Guru

Christian intellectual Vishal Mangalwadi explains why India's experiment in democracy has failed.

He is not yet a household name among evangelical Christians worldwide, but he could well become one. At 48, Vishal Mangalwadi is India's foremost Christian intellectual. The author of seven books, including Truth and Social Reform and Missionary Conspiracy: Letters to a Post-Modern Hindu, Mangalwadi is also an inveterate evangelist and political activist in his home province of Uttar Pradesh in India's north. He has been held briefly in prison several times for his evangelism and social activism among India's rural poor. Educated at Allahabad University and Indore University, Mangalwadi served in the national headquarters of India's ruling Janata Dal party, overseeing agricultural reform.

It was through reading Francis Schaeffer's book Escape from Reason that he became a convinced Christian. He studied for a short time under Schaeffer in 1973, then continued investigating Hindu gurus and dissecting everything from UFOs to tantric sex for his masterly book When the New Age Gets Old (InterVarsity).

Mangalwadi's most recent work, India: The Grand Experiment (U.S. distributor, The MacLaurin Institute), coincides with India's ongoing celebrations of the fiftieth anniversary of its independence from Britain. In it, he provocatively maintains that India would never have been able to develop institutions and a self-understanding capable of sustaining independence without the social, political, educational, and judicial reforms forced upon the subcontinent by the British, particularly in the second half of the nineteenth century when the British evangelical revival had profoundly influenced attitudes in the British Parliament. (In a recent ironic salute to history, Mangalwadi lectured on E. M. Forster's A Passage to India in the author's alma mater of Eton College, where Princess Diana's son William is a student.)

Mangalwadi holds no hope for democracy without the gospel: "The idea of human rights is a peculiarly biblical concept."

Mangalwadi was interviewed for CHRISTIANITY TODAY by former Time magazine senior correspondent and the author of Hope: The Heart's Great Quest (Servant, 1995), David Aikman.

Despite all kinds of problems, India has somehow managed to keep its democracy functioning for half a century. Why are you so pessimistic about India's democratic future?

For all practical purposes, democracy (as an ideal) is finished. There is hardly anyone who would fight for democracy now. It continues because there is no consensus on what to replace it with. Essentially, the days in which we are living resemble the end of the Mogul era (1707–57) when the British Empire began in India. The human-rights violations in India are pretty terrible.

A Punjabi superintendent of police not long ago committed suicide because it was about to be revealed that he had actually killed up to 3,000 people.

But what about the popular image outside India of Gandhian nonviolence and India's democratic ways?

Gandhi in the movie is fictionalized. Even Mrs. [Indira] Gandhi, the prime minister who suspended democratic freedoms during 1975–77, said, "We wrote the constitution, and we can change everything in it." She and others considered knowable moral law as an absurd thing that liberal democracies believed in, not realizing that the system worked as well as it did in America because of the impact of the pulpit on the habits of ordinary people. Human rights may seem "natural," but Mrs. Gandhi said that human rights are what the state gives.

I see the idea of human rights and human dignity as being a peculiarly biblical concept. In Mussolini, Hitler, and Stalin, a Catholic Italy, a Lutheran Germany, an Orthodox Russia succumbed to totalitarianism because of liberal humanist ideas that man can create a utopia. Joseph Campbell [the late renowned scholar of comparative mythology] and Carl Jung were both shocked after they came to India. They realized that the natural law is not natural. The fact is there are consequences to teaching that human beings are nothing but animals. This "truth" destroys the entire basis of civilized political life.

How did you become a Christian?

My parents were both Christian, but it wasn't until my last year of college that I became convinced of Christianity. At first, I didn't feel that I could believe the Bible as God's Word. The turning point was reading Schaeffer's Escape from Reason. By the time I had finished college, I knew that the philosophers knew that philosophy didn't know the truth and couldn't know the truth. Truth only comes through revelation. It seems a foolish idea, after all, that we can speak but that the Creator cannot say anything.

The two Books of Kings and Chronicles in the Bible really began to hit me—this was God's Word written from God's point of view. God was telling his people how their society was disintegrating. Here I was, an Indian reading Jewish history, but it made sense that God had promised that all the nations of the world would be blessed through the seed of Abraham. It was Jewish history written for me to bless my nation. I began to see that it was my only hope. Eventually I wrote to Doctor Schaeffer and asked to study under him, which I did for six months in Switzerland in 1973. He became a model to me of how someone can be a blessing to the whole world.

Why did you return to the countryside rather than, say, try to influence the next generation through teaching?

I wanted to understand how the gospel related to poverty and to understand how young people could serve the poor. I founded an association for cooperative rural assistance. This involved both church planting and socioeconomic development. When it became apparent that there was a real possibility that we might be developing a mass movement after we had baptized 100 converts, we had a number of conflicts with the local Hindu establishment. I was jailed for a few days four different times. Each time the press stood up for me, and the authorities had to let me go. I started writing Truth and Social Reform while in prison.

Your name is associated with the fight to stop the practice of widow burning. How did that happen?

In the 1980s, I talked to a German follower of the Hare Krishna movement who was glorifying sati [the traditional Hindu practice of burning widows alive after the deaths of their husbands; while officially outlawed under the British, it is still practiced]. I had never heard a man defend widow burning before. I then wrote a story for the Indian press about how half a million people in one Indian province were lionizing a widow for having submitted to sati. In this case, the outcry forced the prime minister to arrest the family members, but they were acquitted in 1997. I resigned from the Janata party on the issue of widow burning, which some party members approved of. I was then invited to join the party of the lower castes, Bahujan Samah Party (BSP) and organize its wing in our part of the country.

What was the beneficial impact on Indian economics after the British began their rule that you write about?

British evangelicals brought to India the intellectual, moral, legal, and technical resources needed for economic emancipation. Before the British came, we did not even have the concept of banking or usury in India. Indians buried their money under the floor. The moral and spiritual transformation that Christianity brought about created a situation where you could trust a bank with your money. But there has been a decline of trust in Indian society since.

What is the condition of Christianity in India today?

In some pockets we have a vital church which could become a real hope for India, though much of the institutionalized leadership doesn't have the credibility because of corruption. My one prayer is that we would see that same sort of phenomenon happening in India that we all see in South Korea. That is essentially what I am working for and praying for. Even my sitting down and talking to you threatens a number of Indian Christian leaders. When they come here they are raising money for their projects. But I don't have an empire, and I don't raise any money.

Do you have any hope for democracy in India?

Not without the gospel. The breakdown of liberal democracy and the new fascism of Hinduism is leading them toward a German-style "nationalism." We have religious sects importing plane-loads of arms for civil war [a reference to a plane-load of arms brought to India by a Hindu sect from Pakistan]. There is enough high-explosive material stored up in every Indian city to blow up all of India.

I am hoping that my book will reawaken people. India's future is as great as the promises of God. Ultimately, the hope comes from faith in a transcendent God. As you look around India and see the failure of the institutions, you can sink into despair, but as you look at God, then you have a basis for hope.

Billy Graham Had a Dream

American revivalist preachers have been evangelical Christianity's most visible spokesmen over the centuries. What does their record on race relations show? This article by Edward Gilbreath, excerpted from CHRISTIANITY TODAY's sister publication CHRISTIAN HISTORY, paints a mixed but improving picture.

“Eleven o'clock Sunday morning is the most segregated hour in America,” declared civil-rights leader Martin Luther King, Jr., in a well-known line. What is not so well known is that the remark was first made by someone else in a 1950s Reader's Digest article on racism—Dr. King's friend, evangelist Billy Graham.

To better appreciate the uniqueness of Graham's concern for racial reconciliation, we need to set him in the historical context of a long line of nationally known American evangelists who faced the problem of racism. Their record is mixed.

Consider George Whitefield, the father of America's Great Awakening. In the 1740s, Whitefield won countless souls to Christ—both black and white. Early in his ministry, he questioned the morality of slaveholding. Yet later he approved buying slaves to help work in the fields of his Georgia orphanage. Whitefield justified the move in part because enslaving blacks, he reasoned, exposed them to Christianity.

Like Whitefield, many Christians were opposed to the oppression of blacks but believed the church's main function was to win souls, and secondarily, to perform acts of mercy—but certainly not to change social structures like slavery.

An exception was Charles Finney, who was both an influential evangelist and an outspoken abolitionist. In 1851 he was elected president of Ohio's Oberlin College, a leading stronghold of the antislavery movement. Eleven years later, through Finney's efforts, Oberlin student Mary Jane Patterson became the first African-American woman in the United States to receive a bachelor's degree.

While the nineteenth century saw increased concern over social issues, not every Christian was convinced about the need to abolish slavery. The controversy divided America's largest denominations—Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian.

After the Civil War, southern Christians still balked at integration, as evangelist Dwight

L. Moody discovered. In 1876, during revival meetings in Georgia, the popular evangelist attracted both black and white audiences. The meetings were originally unsegregated. But soon whites began complaining, and those sponsoring the rally divided the seating according to race. From then on, whenever Moody preached in the South, he either addressed audiences that were segregated or held separate services for blacks and whites.

By the early 1900s, evangelist Billy Sunday had become America's pre-eminent preacher. Sunday, who began as a Bible teacher with the Chicago YMCA, had been sensitive to the plight of minorities since the start of his ministry. In the fall of 1917, during his Atlanta crusade, Sunday held special meetings for African Americans and visited several black churches. When it came to holding integrated meetings, however, Sunday drew the line. He knew that any national Christian leader who wanted to maintain his public image could not upset the social mores of the day.

Four decades later, evangelist Billy Graham found himself in a similar bind. Early on, Graham freely accepted the custom of segregated seating at his southern crusades. By 1952, however, the young preacher, now a national figure, began to speak out against racial prejudice in the church. “There is no scriptural basis for segregation,” Graham told a crusade audience in Jackson, Mississippi. “It may be there are places where such is desirable to both races, but certainly not in the church.” Graham's words were greeted with enthusiasm by blacks and a few whites, but provoked criticism from many.

Though the statement was ahead of its time, Graham was still tentative. When pressed by his critics, he softened his views. “We follow the existing social customs in whatever part of the country in which we minister,” he said. “I came to Jackson to preach only the Bible and not to enter into local issues.” But he soon discovered that was no solution. He had to decide where he was going to stand publicly.

In 1953—three years before Martin Luther King hit the national scene and more than a decade before the 1964 Civil Rights Act—Graham stunned the sponsoring committee of his Chattanooga, Tennessee, crusade. At a meeting of the committee, Graham railed against the practice of segregated seating. And then before one of the crusade meetings, Graham personally took down the ropes separating the black and white sections.

In 1957, Graham integrated his ministry internally by adding his first black team member, Howard O. Jones, a young pastor from Cleveland. Soon Graham was working regularly with African-American churches where his crusades were held. That same year, at a black church in Brooklyn, Graham said publicly for the first time that antisegregation legislation might be necessary to bring an end to discrimination. Graham's actions stirred the wrath of many of his supporters who derogatorily labeled him an “integrationist” and a “nigger lover.”

The evangelist held a steady course, consistently speaking out against racial injustice and gradually adding more African Americans to his organization. “His preaching of reconciliation and his call to repentance,” said the late Samuel Hines, a nationally known black pastor, “have had a direct impact on the alienation and polarization which have afflicted our land.” For his part, Graham today simply says, “Of all people, Christians should be the most active in reaching out to those of other races.”

THE POWER OF WORDS

Poets are caretakers of language, the shepherds of words, keep-

I also am in the word business. I preach, I teach, I counsel using words. People often pay particular attention on the chance that God may be using my words to speak to them. I have a responsibility to use words accurately and well. But it isn't easy. I live in a world where words are used carelessly by some, cunningly by others.

THE SECRET OF GOD'S LOVE

Why did God create a world? God created the world for something like the same rea-

But God is infinitely good, and therefore infinitely loving. Why therefore could not He by a free impulsion of His love let love overflow and bring new worlds into being? God could not keep, as it were, the secret of His love, and the telling of it was creation.

Why Evangelicals Have the Biggest Seminaries

And why they are in crisis.

THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES ON CHRISTIAN EDUCATION: A READER ON THEOLOGY AND CHRISTIAN EDUCATION, edited by Jeff Astley, Leslie J. Francis, and Colin Crowder (Eerdmans, 464 pp.; $34, paper); CHANGING THE WAY SEMINARIES TEACH: GLOBALIZATION AND THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION, by David A. Roozen, Alice Frazer Evans, and Robert A. Evans (Hartford Seminary Center for Social and Religious Research/Plowshares Institute, 206 pp.; $13, paper); THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION IN THE EVANGELICAL TRADITION, edited by D. G. Hart and R. Albert Mohler, Jr. (Baker Book House, 320 pp.; $24.99, paper). Reviewed by Robert W. Patterson, a frequent contributor to CHRISTIANITY TODAY.

In his autobiography, Kenneth Taylor, the man who gave life to the Living Bible, recalls his first semester as a student at Dallas Theological Seminary in the fall of 1940. To his astonishment, his Greek professor could not remember all the letters of the Greek alphabet the first day of class, another professor simply read from the class textbook, and a third teacher hounded his students with outlines to memorize. This half-hearted approach to theological education, Taylor says, led several of his classmates to transfer to Princeton Theological Seminary at the end of the semester.

That was then. Today, Ken Taylor's classmates would have no educational reason to transfer to a mainline seminary. Dallas Seminary is the sixth-largest institution accredited by the Association of Theological Schools (ATS). Its standard curriculum for students preparing for the ordained ministry is in many respects the most rigorous of any seminary in the country, demanding four years of graduate study (not three years as most other seminaries require), including three years of Greek, two years of Hebrew, and a senior thesis. Its well-kept, engaging four-block campus not far from downtown Dallas represents a model of educational facilities and resources.

Perhaps more than any other school, Dallas represents the metamorphosis of evangelical theological education since the early 1940s. No longer does anyone need to lament, as did Carl Henry in his autobiography, the "modernist takeover" of Protestant seminaries on the eve of World War II. According to the ATS, evangelicals in the 1990s lay claim to 63 divinity schools and theological seminaries in North America, enrolling more than 30,000 students. In fact, the six largest accredited schools, which account for 20 percent of seminary enrollment nationwide, are Southern Baptist institutions or seminaries with northern evangelical roots (Fuller, Trinity, and Dallas).

Ironically, at the very moment evangelical theological education appears to have come of age, some influential parachurch and megachurch leaders are questioning the whole idea of formal theological education. The observation is made that if men who never spent a day in seminary can build successful ministries like Prison Fellowship, Focus on the Family, and Willow Creek Community Church, why have seminaries at all? In fact, a seminary degree will actually disqualify a candidate from a staff position at some megachurches.

From one angle, this bold questioning of theological education resembles the same concerns William Tennent and George Whitefield expressed about overly educated ministers during the Great Awakening of the eighteenth century. But seen in the context of modern evangelicalism, the growing antagonism toward divinity schools, even conservative ones, represents a sharp departure. Indeed, in the evangelical resurgence that began in the 1940s, the Presbyterian model of a "learned ministry" was advanced with great effectiveness by Harold John Ockenga and Carl Henry, an emphasis that helped balance the more democratic, lay-oriented character of evangelicalism with its dislike of formal structures and penchant for heart knowledge over head knowledge.

Three new books represent widely differing approaches to the role of theological education in the life of the church. From across the Atlantic comes Theological Perspectives on Christian Education, a collection of 29 previously published journal articles, many from a decidedly liberal viewpoint, woven together into one volume by two British ecclesiastical foundations. Issues facing theological education in the wider church are addressed in seven essays, but the focus of the book is Christian education, broadly defined. The volume caters to the mainline crowd, complete with sections exploring trendy approaches to Christian education, including postliberal, liberationist, and feminist. While a few essays are commendable, and while some insights are tucked away in the book here and there, the volume as a whole is disappointing. It will most likely serve as a reference tool, perhaps gathering dust in some library, providing a perfect illustration as to why Alister McGrath found spiritual emptiness in the religious Left of the Church of England.

Nor is the discussion advanced by Changing the Way Seminaries Teach, a volume that deals more with the Christian education of ministers. Produced jointly by two New England think tanks, the Hartford Seminary Center for Social and Religious Research and Plowshares Institute in nearby Simsbury, this extended report assesses a five-year program funded by the Lilly Endowment and the J. Howard Pew Freedom Trust to improve the educational program at 12 North American seminaries, including two evangelical schools, Gordon-Conwell in South Hamilton, Massachusetts, and Conservative Baptist in Denver. The program, however, was not aimed at reducing class size, raising faculty salaries and competence, or exploring the relationship between Christian character and ministerial skills. No, this project was none other than a "global" consciousness-raising effort at these schools, challenging what it claims is their provincialism and isolation from the resources of the Third World church.

While the book accurately gauges what happened—and what more needs to be done—in terms of the ethos, curriculum, and faculty at these seminaries as a result of the project, what globalization really means is anyone's guess. Its trendy, anti-Western, anti-white-male rhetoric and its utopian vision, in the words of the Plowshares Institute, for "a more just, sustainable, and peaceful world community" divert attention away from what might be called the indigenous challenges of theological education in the United States today. Those needs can be no more served with "immersions" of Third Worldisms than seminaries in Korea or Kenya can be improved with "immersions" of Americanisms. An exotic fascination with the Third World is every bit as problematic as alleged Western ethnocentrism; in fact, as William Willimon and Thomas Naylor of Duke University suggest in their new book, Downsizing the U.S.A. (Eerdmans), "localization" more than "globalization" may be the crying need of the times.

Whatever Changing the Way Seminaries Teach and Theological Perspectives on Christian Education lack, however, is more than compensated for by the strong showing of Theological Education in the Evangelical Tradition. This collection of papers presented at a Lilly Endowment-funded conference at the Institute for Study of American Evangelicals at Wheaton College provides penetrating insights into theological education from some of the nation's finest theological educators, including Timothy George, Richard Mouw, and David Wells. Also contributing essays are the volume's editors, two promising educators under the age of 40: D. G. Hart, the prolific writer-librarian at Westminster Seminary in Philadelphia—one of the first "evangelical" institutions north of the Mason-Dixon Line—and R. Albert Mohler, the president of Southern Baptist Seminary in

SHORT NOTICES

SUBVERSIVE SPIRITUALITY
By Eugene H. Peterson
Eerdmans
263 pp.; $18, paper

Subversive Spirituality is a wide-ranging collection of Eugene Peterson's occasional writings spanning a period of some 25 years. The volume is divided into five sections: "Spirituality," "Biblical Studies," "Poetry" (consisting of one longish poem, "Holy Luck"), "Pastoral Readings" (ranging from Revelation to mystery writer Rex Stout), and "Conversations" (a collection of interviews), valuable for Peterson's reflections on the pastoral vocation.

"Spirituality," Peterson writes, "is not the latest fad but the oldest truth," and indeed there is nothing trendy about his account of the spiritual life.

From this assortment two themes or qualities or traits stand out. First is a certain manner—earthy, plainspoken—that most readers would associate with "working men" rather than with pastors. Granting the enormous range of legitimate preaching styles, we need to ask why this down-to-earth manner is so rare in the pulpit today. Second is a literary sensibility that informs everything Peterson writes—and this, too, is increasingly rare among pastors. What a strange and wonderful combination of gifts—and no wonder that this is the man who has given us The Message.

Complete this sentence: "The first book on pastoral care that meant anything to me personally or vocationally was ____." If you are Eugene Peterson, the answer is James Joyce's novel Ulysses. For many more such surprises and useful provocations, read Subversive Spirituality. [C]

Louisville, the first divinity school chartered by Baptists in Dixie.

The book's strength is articulating the conceptual unity that holds evangelical theological education together. Whether exploring the spiritual formation of ministers, the tensions between church and academy, or the place of women in formal educational settings, the book explains how the evangelical approach to training ministers differs from both old-line Protestant and Roman Catholic traditions. That difference, the book illustrates, relates not so much to institutional or formal arrangements but rather to a distinctive set of expectations. "Evangelicals," the introductory essay summarizes, "have been especially wary of religion that appears to be automatic or routine, and they have desired ministers and leaders who have experienced firsthand a vital and deep encounter with God's grace and who could instill and reproduce such characteristics within other believers." This holds true of every stripe of evangelical institution, from the fundamentalist Prairie

Bible College in Three Hills, Alberta, Canada, to the academically demanding Westminster Seminary in Philadelphia.

The volume highlights the historical dimension of that conceptual unity, contending "that the problems seminaries face today are not dramatically different from those that confronted evangelical theological educators in the past." So as evangelicals struggle to understand the tensions between clergy and laity, or seek a more parish-based approach to ministerial training—moot issues among Roman Catholics and old-line Protestants—the volume explores how those same issues have defined evangelicals since Jonathan Edwards. As evangelicals seek to understand how the life of the mind should inform vital piety and gospel zeal (and vice versa), the book reveals how Enlightenment empiricism has been a common element in evangelical education, including William Tennent's "Log College," the old Princeton Seminary, and Charles Spurgeon's "Pastor's College" at Metropolitan Tabernacle in London. The volume even suggests that many of the difficulties facing evangelicals today are rooted in the past; James Bradley of Fuller Seminary, for example, illustrates how the English-Puritan tradition of "practical divinity," with its goal of subduing scholarship to the professional training of pastors, did little to prepare evangelicals for the onslaught of critical and scientific thought in the nineteenth century.

While strong on historical analysis, Theological Education in the Evangelical Tradition is weak on prescription. The concluding four essays, "The Future of Evangelical Theological Education," are brief, reflecting more afterthoughts than serious discussion. Granted, no one knows how evangelical seminaries will change a generation from now, but the insights offered in this book would seem to lead quite naturally to some "definitive guidance," perhaps some kind of standardization of ministerial preparation to guide evangelicals in the twenty-first century.

The time for raising or rethinking standards could not be better. As David Wells outlines in No Place for Truth, the pastoral vocation today is in crisis. Ministers, who in Puritan New England and colonial America were critically important leaders in their communities, have become, in Wells's words, "dislodged from the network of what is meaningful and valuable in society." The structures of modern life, he says, "offer no plausibility for the work they do." The Gordon-Conwell professor could have added that ministers have even lost standing in the Christian community, especially its evangelical expression. The bonds that tie pastors with congregations are weaker than ever, as the average tenure in a pulpit is rarely more than three years; traumatic "forced exits" of pastors, according to a study in LEADERSHIP journal, have reached epidemic proportions. Like Rodney Dangerfield, ministers get no respect. Most public-school teachers have far greater stability and workplace protection, higher salaries, and more generous benefits than ministers enjoy, including a decent pension at retirement.

The pastoral crisis will not be solved overnight, but perhaps the seminaries and the denominations they serve could begin with attention to quality rather than quantity. This shift will not be easy; it would cut the fuel line that has fostered the proliferation of evangelical seminaries in the past 25 years. But the hard questions need to be asked. Do evangelicals in North America really need 63 divinity schools educating 30,000 potential ministers? Has the mass of these institutions really enhanced pastoral quality and effectiveness? Because they compete with one another for market share, evangelical seminaries are not very selective in their admissions policies, admitting virtually anyone with a bachelor's degree. The result is a pool of graduates who do not measure up academically or personally with corresponding professions as well as an oversupply of candidates who struggle to receive a call from a particular congregation or ministry.

This situation will not change unless the churches and the seminaries become genuine stake-holders with students, working together to sponsor and accept only promising candidates, subsidizing their education and funding residency programs, and helping them secure calls. Because the churches today could not realistically commit themselves to 30,000 students, this approach would significantly lower seminary enrollments, but it might reap revolutionary results.

While the popular nature of evangelicalism will resist recommendations like these, the time has come for bold yet respected voices in church and academy to wean evangelicals from the thoroughgoing pragmatism that has contributed to the crisis in the pastoral vocation. For without single-minded devotion to preparing, strengthening, and upholding qualified pastors in their ministry of Word and sacrament in the context of local, healthy congregations, the evangelical faith can only face an uncertain future.

Spiritual Mapping Gains Credibility Among Leaders

Shortly after Bob Beckett learned that the Hemet, California, property he planned to occupy had been a transcendental meditation hot zone, he pulled out an area map and marked the spot.

His finding eventually turned into a concerted, ongoing probe into the dark, spiritual underside of the desert community, southwest of Palm Springs. Beckett, who later planted a church in the city, believes that this spiritual reconnaissance—which he now recognizes as spiritual mapping—provided the fuel for focused prayer that not only unleashed church growth, but has begun to transform Hemet's social fabric.

Beckett's report was one of a half-dozen success stories presented to 400 participants from 31 countries at the first International Consultation on Spiritual Mapping in Tacoma, Washington, in November. Other descriptions of transformation came from Kenya, Nigeria, Colombia, Ecuador, and Guatemala, where Christians claim that a breaking of a territorial spirit's power over their country resulted in unprecedented church growth and the end of 36 years of civil war (CT, Feb. 3, 1997, p. 76).

A PRAYER TOOL: Spiritual mapping is a term coined in 1991 by the Tacoma meeting's organizer, George Otis, Jr., but enthusiastic proponents say it is really the reprise of an old practice that can help propel the church toward fulfillment of the Great Commission.

Spiritual mapping, says Otis, president of the research agency the Sentinel Group, is nothing more ethereal than creating a spiritual profile of a community based on careful research. It is a tool, he says, for intelligent prayer aimed at opening spiritually blind eyes to the gospel.

Otis poured seven years of global research into his new book, The Twilight Labyrinth: Why Does Spiritual Darkness Linger Where It Does? (Chosen Books). He has identified 15 "transformed communities," of which 14 incorporated spiritual mapping. Two factors present in all 15, Otis says, are "persevering leadership" and "united prayer." Commitment is the key, he says. "God didn't move in Hemet until Bob bought a burial plot in the city."

Otis has developed a 28-stage scale to measure the progress of a community from the "spiritual beachhead" phase to "spiritual breakthrough" to "spiritual transformation." Spiritual mapping does not begin until stage nine, Otis points out. "When you reach that point you have a core of intercessors in a community really petitioning God for a visitation," he says.

"LESS FLAKY": Though it still raises many eyebrows among evangelicals, spiritual mapping is gaining broader acceptance, as evidenced by the AD 2000 United Prayer Track's Spiritual Mapping Division, which Otis heads. United Prayer Track coordinator C. Peter Wagner teaches a class on spiritual mapping at Fuller Theological Seminary, which is capped by a field trip to Hemet guided by Beckett.

"There's a lot less flaky stuff in 1997 than in 1990," Wagner says. "We're on a learning curve."

Many of spiritual mapping's detractors have less of a problem with spiritual mapping than with its most common applications, "strategic-level warfare"—defined by Wagner as discerning and praying against ranking evil powers, and he is cautious about a leader repenting for sins in which he did not participate. But Arnold does see value in spiritual mapping "to guide intercessors" as they pray for the lost.

Greg Boyd, author of God at War: The Bible and Spiritual Conflict (InterVarsity, 1997), cautions that there is no clear New Testament precedent for strategic-level warfare. "That doesn't mean you need to rule it out, but it does mean you've got to be careful about excesses," says Boyd, a professor at Bethel College in Minnesota. "I've seen this get real wacko, where people are rebuking a demon over Minnesota. It's better to spend more time on things that have clear precedent."

Otis places the emphasis of spiritual warfare on battling strongholds of the mind rather than of geographical locations, though he does believe that places can become strongholds when they become focal points for deceptive practices. "People who begin spiritual mapping with a focus on trying to identify and name prevailing territorial spirits are likely to get sidetracked," he says.

GAINING ACCEPTANCE: Otis predicts that by the end of the century spiritual mapping will become mainstream. Most of his teaching and training is with evangelicals, whom he finds generally more responsive than charismatics. Still, many evangelical leaders are concerned that this may be a passing fad. Otis says spiritual mapping is especially needed now because Satan will increase his resistance to the church as it moves toward fulfillment of the Great Commission.

"The 1990s are not the 1790s," Otis says. "God is very wise and very resourceful, and he brings to his church different emphases, different methodologies, different strategies to commend the gospel to the prevailing culture."

In 1998, Otis's Sentinel Group, Wagner's Global Harvest Ministries, and Ted Haggard's Christian Information Network plan to move into the high-tech World Prayer Center on the grounds of Haggard's New Life Church in Colorado Springs (CT, May 20, 1996, p. 78). Spiritual mapping will be central to the operation of this "electronic nerve center to connect the intercessors and let each other know what they're hearing from the Holy Spirit," Wagner says.

territorial spirits assigned to a community—and "identificational repentance."

John Dawson's bestseller Taking Our Cities for God (Creation House, 1989) promoted identificational repentance as a way of breaking Satan's hold on a city and bringing reconciliation through confessing and repenting of community sins.

CAUTION URGED: Biola University Talbot Theological Seminary professor Clinton Arnold, author of Three Crucial Questions About Spiritual Warfare (Baker Books, 1997), finds no biblical basis for taking an aggressive posture against high-

MUSIC

Sandi Patty Stages Comeback

Sandi Patty has returned to the top of the Christian music charts with a new recording two years after confessing an extramarital relationship that put her career into a tailspin.

Released in late October, Patty's Artist of My Soul was among the top ten contemporary Christian recordings for more than five weeks.

In August 1995, Patty married Don Pleslis, with whom she had an extramarital affair during her first marriage, which ended in a 1993 divorce (CT, Sept. 11, 1995, p. 72). Pleslis, who is also divorced, had been a backup singer for Patty.

As her personal life came under an intense media spotlight, Patty's recording company, Word Records, delayed release of her Christmas album for one year. Patty reduced her performance schedule, spending more time in Anderson, Indiana, with her new blended family, which now encompasses eight children.

But one year ago, for the Clinton presidential inaugural, Patty began to relaunch her career, starting with her televised singing of "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Last month on ABC's Prime-Time Live Patty said, "I don't want to pretend. I want to set things right. I don't know if there is even a way to make some horrendous wrongs right." Also, in an interview with KSBJ, a Houston radio station, Patty observed, "The owning, naming, and confessing of the sin in my life was the beginning of experiencing the freedom that only comes through Christ."

"I know I let my marriage down with John [Helvering] in huge ways. I have tremendous regrets about that," Patty said she had used her ministry career as a substitute for a spiritual relationship with God. "You think that's a replacement for a relationship, and it is not; that is a lesson I have learned the hard way."

For 1998, Patty has a growing number of performance dates, and there are signs that she is regaining her audience. "Breathe on Me," a song from Artist of My Soul, has gained a spot on Christian radio play lists nationwide. With lyrics such as "Breathe on breath of God. Cover my sin with your mercy," Patty may have found her own distinctive way to integrate a troubled past and an authentic music ministry.

Swift Growth Shapes Potter's House

T. D. Jakes has the type of church problems most preachers crave. The Potter's House has recently added 1,000 parking spaces, hired nine off-duty Dallas police officers to control traffic, and put a full-time minister on staff just to handle new members.

The nationally televised 40-year-old preacher and author bought a 5,000-seat church building in Dallas 18 months ago. Now the Potter's House has grown to more than 14,000 worshipers, including Dallas Cowboys stars Deion Sanders and Emmitt Smith, both baptized in October.

Gary Johnston, director of Church Growth Network in Temecula, California, says the Potter's House is one of the nation's fastest-growing megachurches. "It's phenomenal growth," says Johnston, noting that other megachurches such as Saddleback Valley Community Church in Mission Viejo, California, and Willow Creek in South Barrington, Illinois, took several years to become so large.

The Potter's House bought 34 hilltop acres of southwest Dallas for $3.2 million from evangelist W. V. Grant, recently released from prison.

While the complex is large enough for worship services, there has been some trouble juggling space for ministries, including Bible studies, drug- and alcohol-abuse programs, prison ministries, feeding the homeless, tutoring for students, faith-based weight-loss programs, emergency coun-

The Apostle Shows Grit, Grace

Hollywood does not focus on clergy as often as it does criminals, but when the lens is trained on the pulpit, the plot usually goes one of two ways. There is the Elmer Gantry approach, featuring evangelists as hypocritical flimflam artists; or there is the Nothing Sacred approach, featuring three-dimensional but theologically clueless clergy such as ABC's controversial Father Ray (CT, Sept. 1, 1997, p. 95).

Now comes The Apostle, a groundbreaking film that treats both Pentecostal evangelist Euliss "Sonny" Dewey and his biblical message with deep respect. Robert Duvall is the director, writer, executive producer, and title character.

The movie, out January 30, is drawing acclaim from both secular and religious film critics. "A rare display of spiritual light on screen," writes the New York Times. MovieGuide writes, "There is much to be said in favor of this movie, but most significant is its positive affirmation of God, church, and evangelism."

Evangelist Dewey is no saint. He is a frail, flawed figure who battles pride, lust, and a violent temper that leads to murder and a dramatic fall from grace. Just as dramatic is Dewey's slow, painful redemption.

Duvall has been down this aisle before. He won an Oscar for his touching portrayal of born-again country singer Mac Sledge in the 1983 version of Tender Mercies, by Horton Foote.

"We make great gangster movies, so why not make this kind of movie right, too?" says Duvall, who wrote the screenplay for The Apostle in 1984 after visiting a Pentecostal church in Arkansas. After studios continually turned him down, he invested $5 million of his own savings to make the movie.

Suit Challenges Religion Classes Credit

An Idaho State University student is suing the school for offering course credit for off-campus religion classes taught by the Latter Day Saints (LDS) Institute.

If Carole Wells, a 36-year-old sociology major and board member of the local American Civil Liberties Union chapter, wins her case, the school will likely be forced to shut down its religious-studies department. Wells alleges in her suit, due for a jury trial in U.S. District Court March 17, that the university is violating the U.S. Constitution by involving the state with religious institutions.

The department offers classes from three off-campus organizations: the LDS Institute, the Evangelical Studies Center, and the Logos Center for Religious Studies, which is composed of mainline Protestants and Catholics. All faculty are approved by the college. Most have doctorates, and all have at least master's degrees.

"The regional accrediting agency liked the fact that the program guarantees diversity and that students can choose the perspective," says Mike Powell, director of the Evangelical Studies Center and pastor of University Bible Church.

No college funds are used for the classes. "The only connection is that the university gets money for tuition," says Powell. "We even pay for our photocopying." If the university loses the lawsuit, it will likely close the department because it cannot afford to maintain it without depending on the church-based classes.

Wells is aiming at the LDS Institute because it is the biggest target at the overwhelmingly Mormon university. Of the 360 students taking religious-studies courses for credit, five-sixths of them are enrolled in LDS Institute classes.

About 65 percent of the student body is Mormon, and only 100 are involved in evangelical student groups such as Campus Crusade for Christ or the Baptist Student Union. Powell says the Evangelical Studies Center will continue to offer classes whatever the outcome of the suit.

Vineyard Founder Wimber Dies

Todd Hunter seen as possible successor.

John Wimber, whose ministry helped spawn new theological lingo and mass Christian movements—including the Vineyard—died on November 17, the result of a fall that caused a fatal brain hemorrhage. He was 63.

Wimber had already recovered from cancer in 1993 and a stroke in 1995 (CT, Oct. 7, 1996, p. 49). Last year he underwent triple-bypass heart surgery.

At a November 21 memorial service, an overflow crowd spilled out of the Anaheim (Calif.) Vineyard Christian Fellowship (VCF)'s 3,200 seats and into the aisles and outer rooms where big-screen monitors were stationed. In a fashion Wimber surely would have appreciated, the church he founded worshiped to the accompaniment of electric guitars, keyboards, and the soft beat of drums. Wimber had recently retired as pastor of the church (CT, July 14, 1997, p. 46).

Wimber graduated from Azusa Pacific University in 1970 and pastored the Yorba Linda Friends Church for five years. In 1974, Wimber began breaking traditional evangelical molds when he became director of church growth at the Fuller Evangelistic Association. He later taught a controversial and well-attended "Signs and Wonders and Church Growth" class at Fuller Theological Seminary. In 1978 he became full-time pastor of what became VCF in Yorba Linda, California.

ENORMOUS IMPACT: From that congregation, the Vineyard movement now has grown to nearly 500 churches nationwide and another 250 internationally.

Today, thousands of traditional evangelical churches each Sunday sing Vineyard-produced songs, and Wimber's effective marketing has offered many Protestant denominations and individuals a non-threatening way of charismatic expression.

"The Vineyard has exercised influence all out of proportion to its numbers," Regent University divinity school dean Vinson Synan told CT; "I trace that to Wimber himself. The greatest asset Vineyard had was Wimber, just like Wesley was the greatest asset to the Methodists."

Wimber's Vineyard did not escape controversy. "The Vineyard sometimes let outside influences exercise undue influences within it," Synan says.

Eventually, after embracing the controversial Kansas City prophets, Wimber provided correction to their movement, which broke from the Vineyard in 1996 (CT, Oct.

7, 1996, p. 86). In similar fashion, John Arnott's Toronto Vineyard, home of the Toronto Blessing phenomenon, broke away from the Vineyard in 1995. Wimber had cautioned them not to encourage so-called exotic manifestations, including animal noises (CT, Jan. 8, 1996, p. 66).

Lasting legacy: Wimber had a big impact on the American church.

"John was always on the cutting edge, so naturally he was at a point where there would be differences of opinion as to what he was doing," says Fuller Seminary professor C. Peter Wagner. "But now that he is gone he leaves a legacy not of criticism, but a legacy of positive contribution to the kingdom of God."

Todd Hunter, acting national director of the Association of Vineyard Churches, USA, recalled during the memorial service that Wimber was "always willing to selflessly take whatever heat came his way."

Bob Fulton, international coordinator of the Vineyard International Consortium and Wimber's brother-in-law, remembered his 33 years with Wimber. "When John was wrong, he would repent," Fulton said.

SEARCH FOR IDENTITY: The Vineyard now faces a future without its founding leader. Hunter said Vineyard leaders are more certain how the transition will unfold within the United States than internationally.

"What's next is for the Vineyard in the States to affirm or ratify the national director, to set a course for post-Wimber Vineyard—how we will govern ourselves without his autocratic—and I mean that in the neutral sense of the term—without his autocratic leadership," Hunter told CT. "How can we become more participatory without getting stuck in the mud?"

Before his death, Wimber installed a board of six regional overseers, which included national leaders Hunter and Fulton. There is also a council of district overseers and a leadership team, including area coordinators and task force leaders.

Many observers say the 40-year-old Hunter, who holds a master's degree in biblical studies from Regent University, is Wimber's likely successor as the Vineyard's top leader. Regent University professor of theology J. Rodman Williams says Hunter is highly capable. "He's a well-balanced young man."

Internationally, more questions exist. "We've raised up other countries, and when they got to be a certain size we let them become their own independent Association of Vineyard Churches, which was working as long as John was alive because he was the umbrella man," Hunter says. "How are America and those other countries going to relate? We've said philosophically that we don't want America dominating and leading the whole world."

Synan believes the movement is "struggling to define its future, theologically and every way—whether they would be more of a straightline evangelical church or more of a charismatic and Pentecostal influence."

Wimber's books, including Power Evangelism, Power Healing, Power Points, Power Encounters, and The Way to Maturity, along with the Vineyard's growing contemporary music legacy, will continue to be consulted long after his death.

"John Wimber is one of those rare persons who has been the molder of a generation," Wagner says. "The contribution he has made has actually turned the rudder of Christianity and moved it in the direction the Holy Spirit wants it to go in the twenty-first century."

IRS Spurs Nonprofit Disclosure on Internet

If Christians want to know how much money their favorite ministry took in last year, or how much its top officers make, current federal law does not make it easy for them.

The law only requires that charities show copies of their informational tax return, called Form 990, to those who ask in person. Charities do not even have to provide photocopies.

New IRS regulations, however, will change all that. Anyone else with an interest in a nonprofit organization's finances will soon be able to obtain Form 990 information with little effort. Under the new rules, organizations will have to send out copies of the forms within 30 days of receiving a written request, even if the request comes via e-mail.

INTERNET ACCESS: In addition, the Internal Revenue Service hopes that organizations will make it even easier to procure Form 990 information by offering it on the Internet.

"Regulators are pushing to get 990s up on the Internet because they want as much public accountability as possible," says Paul D. Nelson, president of the Evangelical Council for Financial Accountability (ECFA).

But, says Nelson, it may be a while before Internet users can find all the information they want. "Most organizations will go the mail way to begin with," he says, "and even down the road some may still say they don't want to volunteer that kind of information without being asked first."

He guesses that controversial organizations, especially those with public-policy agendas, will be more likely to wait until being asked before providing the tax information.

Bill Bowers, chief operations officer of Didax Corporation, a company that provides online technical support for several Christian organizations, including Promise Keepers, World Vision, and Christianity Today, Inc., says he does not know of any Christian organization offering the financial information on their own Web sites. "But it seems to be a great, cheap way to get information to donors," he says.

Form 990 information for many nonprofit organizations is already on the Internet's World Wide Web. Most often, such information can be found at larger Web sites devoted to monitoring the nonprofit sector, such as GuideStar: The Donor's Guide to the Nonprofit Universe

PURPOSE AND DESCRIPTION

Star site: GuideStar provides some tax information for nonprofit organizations, but it can be outdated or incomplete.

(<http://www.guidestar.org>) or the Minnesota Attorney General's Charities site (<http://www.ag.state.mn.us/consumer/charities>). These sites typically get the Form 990 information from the IRS directly.

SAVING TIME, MONEY: Under new IRS rules, if an organization posts its Form 990 information on the Internet, the organization does not have to send it to those who make a mail request. This new method can potentially save time and money, though organizations are allowed to charge reasonable photocopying fees for mailed requests ($1 for the first page, 15 cents for each additional page, the same rates used by the IRS).

The IRS estimates that only about 1,000 of more than one million tax-exempt groups will make their Form 990s available on the Internet. Nelson says he does not know of any ECFA member organizations offering Form 990 information on their own Web sites.

"We don't have our 990 on the Internet and we aren't planning to," says Chuck McGinty, field communications director for Compassion International. "We do, though, have our financial statement on the Web."

For the few people who ask, a Form 990 is mailed, but most simply want to see a pie chart of how ministry expenses are subdivided, McGinty says.

Nonprofit watchdog groups, major donors, journalists, academic researchers, and ministry employees have strong interest in easy access to Form 990 information for analysis and comparison. Since the IRS each year audits relatively few nonprofits, public disclosure enhances the ability of an independent outsider to question how a ministry expends funds.

The Form 990 does not even have to be on the organization's own Web site. As long as it is accessible from the organization's site, it can be stored at another address used as a database of documents for similar organizations.

ECFA has no plans to offer such a database, but it has considered "crossposting" member information. For example, a member organization could show the ECFA logo with a hyperlink to the ECFA Web site to show they are in good standing with the council. Conversely, ECFA could have a list of links to member organizations.

"But right now, our front burner is compliance with the new guidelines," Nelson says. "ECFA is simply trying to make organizations aware of the law."

FOILING FOES: The new guidelines also allow exemptions from the photocopying requirement if an organization can prove requests for the copies are part of a harassment campaign aimed at making the organization do extra work.

"In the public-policy area, especially organizations involved in the abortion and gay-rights debates, there have been concerted efforts to disrupt business," Nelson says.

Even in such cases, the organizations must always provide copies to journalists, hostile or not, with no apparent ties to the harassment campaign.

An organization cannot deny requests for photocopies due to an increase in requests from the public after a national news story about the organization, such as the Federal Election Commission's complaint against the Christian Coalition in 1996.

The new regulations will go into effect 60 days after the IRS issues final rules on enforcing the law, which are expected shortly after a February hearing. Nonprofits that do not comply may be fined up to $10,000. Nelson greatly approves of the regulations, saying, "This is a significant act for donors simply because it's one more way to get them the information they need."

Born-again Christians Lead Norway

During the recent election campaign, thousands of Norwegian believers fasted and prayed to ask God to intervene on behalf of their country.

The result is unique to modern Europe: more than half of the new government's 19 ministers, including Prime Minister Kjell Magne Bondevik, are born-again Christians.

"There has been no such thing as a government with a born-again majority in Norway ever, at least not in modern times," says evangelical leader Trygve Brekke, senior pastor of the charismatic Christian Service Church in Stavanger.

The previous Socialist government favored abortion rights and homosexual marriage. The Bondevik cabinet, in office since October 21, is a coalition among the Christian Popular Party of Bondevik, the Center Party, and the Left Party. Bondevik says the politics of his cabinet will be grounded in the "Christian inheritance" of Norway. In his inaugural speech, Bondevik—a Lutheran pastor who has declared that "God is my strength"—said the "erosion of morals and foundational values" must be halted. A new commission will be assigned the task of reversing "destructive trends."

"There is presently a strong interest, and not only among Christians, in re-establishing foundational values," Brekke says. Erling Rimehaug, political editor of Norway's Christian daily Vaart Land, says the commission will deal with matters such as "greed, tax dodging, sexual abuse, violence, the erosion of family life, and extreme youth cultures."

Brekke is heartened by the new Christian majority. "I expect it to change the direction Norway is going," Brekke says. "But it won't happen overnight, and it is important that the churches keep on praying. If the churches pressure Bondevik to push controversial issues with no chance of getting a majority vote, they will achieve nothing but his fall."

Rimehaug also says the new prime minister will not campaign for an untenable cause. "The Christian Popular Party is committed to changing the abortion laws, but no government proposals have been announced since the Parliament majority is clearly against it," Rimehaug says.

ARCHAEOLOGY

Pottery Shard Points to Temple

A potshard with an inscription of a receipt may contain the earliest extrabiblical reference to Solomon's Temple in ancient Jerusalem.

Top biblical scholars seem convinced of its authenticity, despite its unknown source. After surfacing on the antiquities market, the shard became part of the collection of London businessman Shlomo Moussaieff. The inscription is translated: "Pursuant to the order to you of Ashyahu the king to give by the hand of Zecharyahu silver of Tarshish to the House (or Temple) of Yahweh. Three shekels."

Scholars date the inscription from the ninth century to the seventh century B.C., based on the early-Hebrew script that was common before the Babylonian exile.

Ashyahu is not known as one of the kings of Judah. University of Chicago scholar Dennis Pardee suggests the name could be Josiah, who ruled Judah from 640 to 609 B.C.

Frank Moore Cross of Harvard and P. Kyle McCarter of Johns Hopkins believe the inscription is older, dating perhaps to the reign of King Joash, 835 to 796 B.C.

Christians Protest Trade Embargo

Three Christian organizations that provide aid to Iraq are calling for an immediate lifting of the United Nations embargo against the nation ruled by Saddam Hussein.

The Atlanta-based Conscience International (CI) is spearheading the embargo protest. Venture Middle East and the Middle East Council of Churches have also signed a declaration demanding an end to the trade embargo.

According to the World Health Organization and other UN agencies, 1.2 million people have died from the effects of malnutrition and medical shortages in the wake of trade sanctions imposed in 1990.

The infant mortality rate has doubled, and 6,000 children under the age of five die every month in Iraq. "Basra has no potable water supply and little electricity," says the city's Eastern Orthodox archbishop, Gabriel Kasab. "Epidemics rage, taking away children by the thousands. Our situation is unbearable."

A U.S. State Department official contends the Iraqi government is responsible for depriving citizens of food and medicine.

Christian relief agencies have supplied millions of dollars in medicine to Iraq. They also held workshops in Iraq in December on mother and child health. [C]

Evangelicals, Catholics Issue Salvation Accord

The Gift of Salvation," a document expressing significant theological agreement between evangelicals and Roman Catholics, is drawing mixed reactions from leading evangelicals.

The document (CT, Dec. 8, 1997, p. 35) represents signers' ability "to express a common faith in Christ and so to acknowledge one another as brothers and sisters in Christ." It has been signed by 16 Roman Catholic leaders and 19 leading evangelicals, including theologians Thomas Oden, J. I. Packer, and Timothy George; seminary presidents Richard Mouw (Fuller) and Kent Hill (Eastern Nazarene); scholars Mark Noll and Os Guinness; Bill Bright, Campus Crusade for Christ; author Max Lucado; and Robert Seiple, World Vision.

Signers of the document, released November 12, gave assurances that "for the first time in 450 years, evangelical Protestants and Roman Catholics have publicly agreed to a common understanding of salvation."

Some scholars outside the drafting process have applauded the effort. Roger Nicole, of Reformed Theological Seminary in Orlando, told CT, "Although I might have used a slightly different expression in a few places, I am so pleased with the context and mood of this document."

However, several leading Southern Baptists disagree. "The document appears to be inherently inconsistent," says Phil Roberts, director of interfaith witness for the SBC North American Mission Board. "The basic agreements regarding salvation appear to be nullified by the questions which the document says require further exploration. How is it that sacramental grace is still an outstanding question [when] salvation by faith alone is affirmed by the document?"

Mark Coppenger, president of Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Kansas City, Missouri, agrees. "I loved most of what I read in this document, both the content and the spirit," Coppenger says. But he did not sign it, he says, because it appeared that what Catholics agree to in one section they hedge on in another. "How can those matters [of a sacramental system and purgatory] be open when the matter of 'faith alone' is settled?" Coppenger asks.

R. Albert Mohler, Jr., president of Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, Kentucky, says, "Justification by faith alone, if genuinely affirmed by Catholics and evangelicals, would require repudiation of baptismal regeneration, purgatory, indulgences, and many other issues presently affirmed by Roman Catholic doctrine."

FIRST DECLARATION: "The Gift of Salvation" is the second major public document to emerge from a nearly six-year process initiated by Prison Fellowship founder Charles Colson and Catholic leader Richard John Neuhaus of the organization Religion and Public Life.

The first document, "Evangelicals and Catholics Together," received much criticism in conservative evangelical circles following its release, prompting two SBC leaders to withdraw their names (CT, May 15, 1995, p. 53). Critics contended it did not sufficiently grapple with potentially unbridgeable differences between evangelical and Catholic theology.

Colson says that in facilitating the process that produced "The Gift of Salvation," he was determined to come up with a document that would pass evangelical muster. "After my experience with ECT I," Colson says, "I made a decision: I would not allow us to arrive at any document that was not satisfactory to John Woodbridge, Timothy George, and J. I. Packer." All three theologians approved the document.

REPEAT PERFORMANCE? Colson recalls circulating the first document prior to its public release and receiving no negative responses initially. He hopes history does not repeat itself with "The Gift of Salvation."

Among the concerns critics have expressed is that public statements do not accurately represent the Catholic church.

According to this argument, the evangelical public might be wrongly led to believe the Catholic church has conformed to a Reformational position on justification when, in fact, the only ones who have changed are the handful of people who sign these documents.

However, Hill maintains that this line of reasoning does not take into account the stature of those who have signed the document or the involvement of the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical representatives.

Roberts points out, "No presiding bishop or member of the Ecumenical Secretariat nor representative of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops signed the document. It should therefore be taken with a grain of salt." Nevertheless, Hill says, "Based on my reading of the Catholic catechism and on my knowledge of Catholic leaders who have endorsed this process, I'm convinced that this document reflects official Catholic doctrine on soteriology. Otherwise, those Catholics who were part of this dialogue could not have signed the statement."

A DIFFERENT ERA: Catholics and

evangelicals alike maintain that Vatican II ushered in a new era in Protestant-Catholic relations. Hill says, "I want to be careful not to overstate my belief that God has been involved in this process, but in some of the meetings we had a clear sense that someone else was seated at the table."

Instead of ignoring or downplaying important differences between Catholic and evangelical doctrine, "The Gift of Salvation" candidly acknowledges them, saying they "require further and urgent exploration."

Despite the criticism Colson encountered as a result of the 1994 statement, he is appreciative. Their voices, he says, resulted in a stronger statement, one that, because of its essentially theological nature, has far wider implications for evangelical-Catholic unity. In fact, he says, more than one person has suggested to him that had this kind of agreement been achieved five centuries earlier, the Protestant-Catholic split might not have taken place.

China's Leaders Critical of 'Clandestine' Missions

The China Christian Council (CCC), a national association of registered churches, has severed its ties with the Southern Baptist Convention (SBC) because of its alleged "clandestine" missionary activity.

But the council's action is not expected to trigger the ouster of eight SBC missionaries working through the CCC. Avery Willis, senior vice president for overseas operations with the SBC's International Mission Board (IMB), traces the disagreement to Southern Baptists sharing their Christian faith while working in professional capacities throughout China. There are 14 such individuals, most of them on two-year assignments. "I think this is strictly an isolated situation," Willis says. "It's not new. Ten years ago we talked about the same thing."

The dispute boiled over in November when the CCC posted a letter on the Internet announcing an end to the relationship with the IMB. The agreement between the Foreign Mission Board—renamed the IMB during SBC's massive restructuring (CT, Oct. 17, 1997, p. 96)—had only been formalized in July 1996.

CRITICISM FROM CHINA: In the letter, council president Wenzao Han said the CCC and its government-sponsored Three-Self Patriotic Movement (TSPM) have always followed the principle that all church work should be open and above board.

In his letter, Han expressed disappointment that the IMB has, "without consulting us, adopted a 'two-track approach' vis-à-vis China.

"In this view, while not giving up its 'partnership' with the CCC as the 'open' track, [IMB] will try to give major attention to a clandestine track, through which church workers from abroad are secretly sent to China to carry out 'missionary' work as dictated by the IMB."

Such people do not make their mission-board relationships known to the CCC or the government, he said. Han expressed respect for SBC missionaries who had resigned "rather than be a party to IMB deception."

SOME STEP DOWN: While three SBC career missionaries stepped down after the council's announcement, Willis maintains the agency is caught in the middle of the dispute between Christians who believe in working through official channels and those who consider that an unacceptable compromise.

The CCC insists that it is the exclusive channel for any Protestant worker coming into China for religious purposes. Yet, Willis notes, thousands of Christians are bearing a Christian witness in such professions as school teacher or humanitarian aid worker. "Anybody related to the SBC is legally in the country at the awareness of the Chinese government, not for religious work, but for humanitarian projects," Willis says. "We don't feel we're being secretive in that sense."

While the status of the eight career missionaries is unclear, the Southern Baptist official says the CCC has hinted that it would like them to remain in the country to work with other organizations or churches.

The former liaison for SBC short-term missions work in China is disturbed by what he sees as the IMB's casual treatment of the matter, saying the agency has turned its back on earlier pledges to cooperate with Chinese leadership.

Britt Towery says he took early retirement in 1992 after 30 years as a missionary rather than accede to SBC policy. He insists that China's government is not trying to "smash" the church as the Soviet Union did.

"This is dishonest. It's the wrong way to share the gospel," Towery told CT. "You don't have to sneak around like you do in a Muslim country. It's why we've got to be above-board."

HOUSE-CHURCH POLICY: Internal Chinese government documents have surfaced recently disclosing that high-level Communist party leaders are determined to shut down unregistered meetings of Christians, which typically take place in homes. Under Chinese law, the government-controlled Catholic Patriotic Association (CPA) and the TSPM for Protestants are the only legal religious organizations for Christians.

Documents written by the government-controlled New China News Agency and distributed to top officials demonstrate that the government has taken steps to close unofficial churches. According to the reports, the Communist Party Committee in Hebei Province has largely brought the underground Catholic church under direct control of the atheistic government's CPA. "It has successfully prohibited a series of large-scale illegal religious meetings, scattered the leadership structure of the underground forces, and, in accordance with the law, sealed up and destroyed the churches and meeting points of the underground forces," the dispatch states.

In Liaoning Province, grassroots Communist party units have been able to "resolutely exterminate illegal Protestant and Catholic organizations, and split and destroy their underground forces," according to the document.

However, in Henan Province, "illegal" activities, especially evangelical house churches, continue to increase because local Communist party control is unstable. Underground Christians are meeting in 112 of the 130 cities and counties in Henan, the government reports.

ACADEMIC

HYMNODY IN AMERICAN

PROTESTANTISM: A Call for Papers
The Institute for the Study of American Evangelicals announces a project using hymn texts as a source for illuminating American protestant history. The ISAE seeks proposals or competitive grants of $1,500 for article-length papers that study some aspect of the 90 most-often republished hymns. Successful papers will use the rich hymnological literature that is available on individual hymns and their authors, but they will use that literature to shed more light on important questions in broader Protestant history. Proposals and supporting materials must be received by April 30, 1998. For details, application information, and a copy of the list of most frequently published hymns, contact the ISAE, Wheaton College, Wheaton, IL 60187; (630) 52-5437; isae@wheaton.edu.

RECENTLY, ONE OF OUR STUDENTS, JOHN-PAUL LOTZ, was struck and pinned in his car while entering the freeway. Several surgeries and many days in the hospital followed. Knowing that he was hundreds of miles from home, the Beeson Divinity School family responded with an outpouring of love and support. Reflecting on this, John-Paul, who was born in Switzerland and studied in Germany, summed up his experience in three German words, "Beziehung macht alles," "relationship is everything."

I CAN THINK OF NO MESSAGE MORE IMPORTANT for theological education today—"relationship is everything." The mission of Beeson is to prepare persons whom God has called to be ministers of the Gospel for service in the Church of Jesus Christ. This requires a serious engagement with the primary documents of the Christian faith, a deep understanding of our historical and theological foundations, as well as the ability to read the culture and boldly proclaim God's Word. But books, classrooms, and computers do not by themselves a theological community make! This requires regular worship of the Triune God and cultivation of spiritual disciplines for faculty, students, and staff alike.

NO ONE CAN BE A MINISTER of the Gospel alone. All too often the culture of theological education reinforces patterns of isolation and competition. Our job is to nurture relationships so that every student may grow toward full maturity in Christ. Focus on relationality does not mean capitulating to the therapeutic culture with its "touchy-feely" techniques. It does mean taking time to listen, pray together, read God's Word, and celebrate His presence in worship.

When this happens, the chapel will become as important as the library, the prayer closet as prized as the computer lab.

CHARLES COLSON & Nancy Pearcey

Madison Avenue's Spiritual Chic

The typical television commercial is "a morality play for our time."

"A car that can help save your soul." Would that commercial entice you to buy a Volvo? Or how about this: A young woman sits in church, "confessing" her miserly ways. "It's not a sin to be frugal," the preacher reassures her. And the young woman is released from guilt to enjoy her sporty new Chevy Cavalier.

Madison Avenue has discovered spiritual chic.

Commercials are cultural bellwethers. Advertisers spend fortunes on studies to probe our psyches so they can pitch their products to our deepest longings. Today "spirituality is in," says Sam Keen, author of Hymns to an Unknown God. It has become profitable to exploit Americans' growing spiritual hunger.

In a commercial for IBM's Solutions for a Small Planet, Catholic nuns walking to vespers talk about surfing the Net. Gatorade features Michael Jordan running in Tibet and meeting an Eastern holy man who intones, "Life is a sport; drink it up." Snickers shows a politically correct football team inviting a Catholic priest to bless the team, followed by a rabbi, a Native American, a Buddhist, and a long line of other spiritual leaders. The tag line: "Not going anywhere for awhile? Grab a Snickers."

There is no missing the religious overtones in this familiar television commercial: With a flood threatening to wash away the family home, a father cries out for help. Behold, the heavens open and a giant cartoon hand descends to rescue the family from disaster. The company, of course, is Allstate insurance. One almost expects to see the family offer up a prayer: "We thank thee, Allstate, for thy help in times of trouble."

The need for salvation has been imprinted on the human soul since the Fall. Ironically, in contemporary America, advertisers seem more attuned to that need than our spiritual leaders are, and more adept at exploiting it. This is no accident: According to sociologist James Twitchell in Adcult USA, the people who developed the art of modern advertising in the early part of this century were largely Christians, often sons of clergymen, who imported the methodology of religious revivalism into the commercial arena. The spiritual sequence of sin-guilt-redemption was transposed into the psychological sequence of problem-anxiety-resolution.

Thus the typical television commercial is, in Twitchell's words, "a morality play for our time." We see a man or woman in distress: he has a cold; she has stains on the laundry. A second figure appears on the screen promising relief. This person gives witness to the power of the featured product. The product is tried and, Hallelujah! the problem is solved. Finally, the disembodied voice of a male announcer—like a voice from on high—presses home the product's advantages.

"The powerful allure of religion and advertising is the same," Twitchell concludes. Both reassure us: "We will be rescued."

Since advertisers are paid to hook people at the deepest level, it's no wonder they are hooking into the spiritual. We were created to be in communion with the Creator, and the faith dimension is at the core of our nature. Novelist John Updike compares the effort put into commercials with the fanatical care medieval monks put into decorating sacred books. The goal of all this labor, Updike writes, is "to persuade us that a certain beer or candy bar, or insurance company or oil-based conglomerate, is, like the crucified Christ . . . the gateway to the good life."

Of course, commercials have always sold more than products. When an ad features a well-dressed businessman, it's selling an image of success. When an ad features a sultry model, well, we all know what it's selling. But it is profoundly disturbing to see religion reduced to one more handle for manipulating viewers' acquisitive desires. When our kids hum the catchy jingle of the latest commercial, is their spiritual impulse being diverted into consumerism? Are they absorbing Madison Avenue's false values?

We must remember that no part of culture is religiously neutral, no part free from the need for an informed Christian critique. Ads do a service when they convey information about a product in a creative manner. But today's ads often do much more. They exploit our deepest longings, sell false philosophies, pander to self-indulgence. And ads with spiritual themes trivialize religion by reducing it to a marketing ploy.

We should not shrink from calling admakers to account. Saab's "Find your own road" campaign featured characters who fantasize about never shaving again, about leaving work, about "flying in the face of convention," and driving off into the sunset. In other words, Saab wasn't just selling cars, it was selling a philosophy: the theme of autonomy, of breaking the rules, of rebellion against the constraints of civilized society.

After I criticized the ad on my radio program BreakPoint, the president of the company notified us that the ad program was under review and that we would not be seeing those ads anymore. The company's new ads stress product and performance. Two thumbs up for Saab.

Make a point of discussing ads like these when they appear on the screen and inoculating yourself and your children against their appeal. And why not write to the company expressing your objections? After all, a good ad should sell a product, not a philosophy.

"How I Became a Better Pastor"

"I wanted to further my education, but I didn't want to leave my ministry, uproot my family, and become a full-time student. Luckily, there was Trinity Theological Seminary. My counselor at Trinity helped me to establish a personalized degree program that allowed me to study at home and still receive an accredited, quality education. I was also able to apply what I learned as I learned it, and my ministry was enriched. I would highly recommend Trinity to any pastor who wants to grow in his ministry."

Trinity Theological Seminary is the only seminary in the United States accredited by the University of Liverpool. Through our external studies program, on-line learning, and residency seminars, you will receive a quality education that will enrich your life and enhance your ministry. Talk to the admissions counselors at Trinity and map out a better ministry, both for you and for your pastorate.

Contact the admissions counselors at Trinity for more information.

A Tough Choice

INSIDE CT

How we chose this issue's cover story provides a window into this magazine's editorial dynamics. We had three contenders, each representing a different piece of journalistic turf CHRISTIANITY TODAY is committed to cover.

First was an issue debated in the church. Psychiatrist Dwight Carlson takes up the task of "Exposing the Myth That Christians Should Not Have Emotional Problems" (see p. 28). His article is paired with a frank conversation about pretense in the pews with Steve Arterburn of New Life Clinics, the group that has done the most to make evangelicals comfortable with seeking therapy. We felt that many readers struggle with the proper role of psychology.

Second, an issue debated in the Christian academy. Our next contender for cover story was a spirited exchange over whether the evangelical theological consensus, which made our movement possible, has broken down or will soon do so. Bethel Seminary professor Roger Olson, coauthor of 20th-Century Theology, sketches the theological map, and three theologians respond: the staunch-conservative-turned-theological-pioneer Clark Pinnock; the hip-liberal-turned-paleo-orthodox Thomas Oden; and Southern Baptist historical theologian Timothy George, who hasn't changed much but is always worth listening to (see p. 52). While fewer of our readers live with these issues day to day, we felt many would be interested. We are all affected by the outcome of the debate, which will determine the degree of evangelical common ground.

And the winner is—a Christian idea debated in the culture. Apartheid was doubly tragic because South African culture was so permeated by Christian themes. During apartheid, Christians proved just how much evil could be done in Christ's name. Beginning on page 18, the new dean of Duke University's divinity school, L. Gregory Jones, shows that while the church was crippled it was not broken, and out of the ashes has emerged the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, "one of the most dramatic and hopeful signs of an authentically Christian contribution to political life to emerge in many years." Combined with Seattle Pacific University professor Susan VanZanten Gallagher's eyewitness account and Bishop Desmond Tutu's reprise of what has been achieved, this cover-story package constitutes an exciting and hopeful statement of Christian social impact today. We felt we could all be inspired by this report.

If you disagree with our choice, feel free to read your contender first. CT editors try to cover each of these areas, and more, as we attempt to report on what the Holy Spirit is doing in his church. As always, let us know what you think of our efforts and choices (see Letters, p. 6).

"RIGHT DIAGNOSIS, WRONG RESPONSE"

"The Making of a Revolution" [Dec. 8] conveys the "giddy" excitement Phillip Johnson and others feel in believing he leads a revolution that will cause Darwinism to go "belly up." However, the situation warrants more caution.

The article ignored the question of why many Christians most qualified to assess Johnson's scientific claims remain unconvinced. His philosophy troubles many Christian scientists more than his scientific claims. He agrees with atheists such as Dawkins, Sagan, and Provine that evolution and a materialistic metaphysics are inseparable, implicitly affirming the logic of their anti-Christian argument—that evolution by natural selection (if true) implies Christianity is false. But this is precisely the issue that needs refutation. Equating natural selection with materialistic metaphysics makes no more sense than equating gravity with materialism because it explains planetary motion without mentioning God. Johnson has ceded the most critical part of the debate to those with an anti-Christian agenda, insisting on a position that is more restrictive than that held by seminal fundamentalist theologian B. B. Warfield.

Remarkably, Johnson labels Christian scientists who disagree with him "accommodationists," saying they lack objectivity—that "they are thirsty for approval of non-Christian peers" or have been "brainwashed." What could compromise objectivity more than Johnson's own belief that acknowledging evolution is tantamount to betraying Jesus?

A concise assessment of Johnson's work would be: Right political diagnosis—wrong response. Evolution is inappropriately used to advance metaphysical ends, but Johnson's response is philosophically and scientifically flawed.

Prof. Joel W. Cannon Centenary College of Louisiana Shreveport, La.

Tim Stafford's report on Phillip Johnson should convince all creationists that nothing new has been added to the "creation-

WE GET LETTERS

Using e-mail, fax, and old-fashioned snail mail, readers' letters to CT editors totaled nearly 1,500 during 1997. By far, the subject that commanded the greatest attention was the ongoing controversy over the proposed, then withdrawn, inclusive-language edition of the New International Version of the Bible (already published in Great Britain), and the ensuing discussion of Bible translation issues. Other articles that produced strong reactions from readers in 1997 were Daniel Clendenin's piece on Eastern Orthodoxy (Jan. 6, 1997) and Gary Burge's analysis of evangelical worship (Oct. 6). Scores of writers also responded to Michael Hamilton's examination of the legacy of the late Francis Schaeffer (Mar. 3) and to Philip Yancey's "A State of Ungrace" (Feb. 3), asking if the church has forgotten its central message in fighting contemporary culture wars.

For 1998, keep those cards, letters, faxes, and e-mails coming.

evolution" debate that will persuade the evolutionist to change his mind.

Eugene F. Anthony Ballwin, Mo.

Although I agree wholeheartedly with Johnson's criticisms of Darwinian evolution, I'm not sure a complete revolution can occur until the efforts of deconstruction are supplemented with those of reconstruction. I have a feeling most people will hold to a bad theory, in this case Darwinian evolution, until they are offered something better.

Rialto, Calif.*

■ If Johnson is correct that evolutionary theory fails to account adequately for the existing data, I have full confidence that those scientists who have expertise in this area will recognize this state of affairs and move toward some better explanation. This is how science works. I am completely unconvinced of Johnson's position that the scientific community wants to cling to an inadequate theory because it helps them maintain an atheistic world-view.

LEARNING TO DIALOGUE

■ The new ECT statement on salvation improves upon and clarifies the ambiguities of the earlier statement and shows that just as we learn to speak by speaking and to write by writing, so we learn to dialogue by dialoguing ["Evangelicals and Catholics Together: A New Initiative," Dec. 8]. That Catholic theologians wish to embrace the doctrine of justification by faith alone as accurate biblical teaching, and that they desire to acknowledge that the core of the Reformation theological tradition is in agreement with, and not in contradiction to, the biblical gospel, is most welcome. On the other hand, that evangelical scholars are admitting the term "free" in connection with our willing adherence to the gospel (something Martin Luther would have died ten deaths before acknowledging), and that faith,

"though inherently personal, is not a purely private possession but involves our participation in the body of Christ" throughout the centuries of her existence, is a welcome corrective to certain traditions within evangelical Protestantism.

In reading this document I feel like a man who thought he was looking into the heart of an enemy, but who saw there love and understanding. Add my name to the list.

Pastor Tom Scheck Evangelical Free Church Orleans, Neb.

■ As a Catholic and long-time subscriber to CT I was heartened to see such a clear articulation of the saving faith that Catholics and evangelicals share in common. I hope the statement receives a wide hearing and that the group that produced it can continue their discussions with mutual love and respect as common brethren in the faith. Although Timothy George's assessment was well said, it would have been nice to have had a Catholic assessment as well. Also, it seems appropriate to me that in future discussions some respected theologians who are women might be added to the group from both traditions.

Rick McKinney Gaithersburg, Md.

Although I might have used a slightly different expression in a few places if I had written this text, I am so pleased with the context and the mood of this document, and especially of Timothy George's as-

It's Put More Christians At Stake Than Nero.

Throughout history, countless Christians have fallen victim to the power of money. So if you've been struggling to find the balance between finance and faith, remember this. Real security is not a matter of what's in your pockets. But who's in your heart.

Unity is a fine thing—but not at the price of compromise: I'm sure you will agree. The idea seems fine—but we see no move by the Catholics to give up the real reasons for separation, which are not in the Bible!

Paul B. Cole
Big Bear City, Calif.

The continuing attempts of Protestants to call Roman Catholics "brothers and sisters in Christ" reflects the value our society places on compromise rather than the truth of the gospel. I believe there are several substantial issues that separate Protestant and Roman Catholic fellowships: (1) the interpreting of the Bible as part of church tradition rather than as being the sole authority for life and faith; (2) the centuries of accumulated church tradition that are upheld as authoritative truth that often contradicts the most basic biblical pronouncements; (3) the blatant idolatry supported by the highest levels of Roman Catholic tradition; (4) the distortion of the biblical teaching of salvation through Christ's atoning death; and (5) the reliance upon a complex system of sacraments and works. While the document admits these "differences" of belief, it fails to acknowledge that these are at the core of Roman Catholic tradition, and it is doubtful that these will change. I maintain that the Roman Catholic tradition's contradiction of Scripture in these issues should keep any from considering them in the family of the Christian faith.

To continue to speak to Roman Catholics as if they were true followers of Jesus Christ is to fail to speak the Word of God accurately to those who most need to hear it. Christopher Schansberg Scottsburg, Ind.

The best answer to the ECT crowd is that more North American Catholics have been born again in the last 25 years than Europeans evangelized during the Reformation. God helping us, those of us in Roman Catholic evangelization will continue to lead Catholics to biblical salvation and then to urge them to leave the Scarlet Harlot! Pastor Lyle P. Murphy

MARY'S UNIQUE ROLE

At a time when some leading Protestants are de-emphasizing theological differences in order to seek agreement with Roman Catholics, it was refreshing to read David Neff's courageous and biblically based editorial ["Let Mary Be," Dec. 8] on the unique role that Mary played in God's great plan of salvation. Let us honor her memory as the blessed Mother of Jesus and learn from her example of joyful obedience. But let us not mix folklore with divinely revealed truth. Indeed, let Mary be!

Humberto M. Rasi
Silver Spring, Md.

I believe there is an unfortunate misunderstanding afoot with regard to the question of declaring the Mother of God (an ancient, orthodox declaration rather audacious in itself) Co-Redeemer, Mediatrix, and Advocate, a misunderstanding that Catholics and Protestants alike may be sharing in this matter. Like the title Mother of God, the proposed nomenclature is attempting to highlight a theological truth that on its face only appears to be primarily about the singular personhood of Mary herself. In fact, the office of Co-Redeemer/Mediator/Advocate has a simple name: Christian. Every obedient believer participates in and cooperates with the plan of salvation on behalf of others. In so doing they become, in a very real sense, co-redeemers, mediators, and advocates; furthermore, they are called to "share in the divine nature," and are ultimately destined to be glorified with Christ and to interact with the life of the Holy Trinity. Mary is simply the highest model of this reality; as the church's Exemplar, she calls us to imitate her own graced response to God Almighty—like mother, like children. Seen in this light, the proposed "elevation" of Mary is nothing more than an announcement of the immanence of the glorification of the entire church, part and parcel of the gospel itself.

Nicholas A. Marziani, Jr., Associate Rector
St. Nicholas' Episcopal Church
Midland, Tex.

Neff's editorial treated the concept of Mary as "Co-Redeemer" and "Co-Mediatrix" as something yet to be asserted by the Roman Catholic Church (RCC). While it may be true that the current pope has not offered an official statement on the issue, the RCC has not been silent. The fact is that the RCC has declared, with papal authority, that Mary holds both titles. Even Pope John Paul II has said so "on the side." I have been reading through the "new" Roman Catholic Catechism to see what the RCC believes. A short side trip on the topic of Mary took me to the utterances of Pope Leo XIII who, in 1892 and 1893, proclaimed Mary to be both Co-Mediator with Christ and even Co-Redeemer through her abundant grace. The fact that the current pope has not made a statement does not erase the record. It is already established as doctrine and therefore does not need restatement to be confirmed.

Can we really even think of making a treaty with the RCC until the offices of mediator, savior, and redeemer are given solely to Christ? Pastor Randy Campbell
Midland, Mich.

While Leo XIII and Pius X have used these titles for the Virgin Mary, they did so in ways that were not fully binding on Roman Catholics. The petition that Newsweek reported on asked the current pope to proclaim Mary's roles as Co-Redeemer and Mediatrix of All Graces as dogma—much in the same way that Pius IX declared her Immaculate Conception in what was touted as the first infallible papal declaration.
 —Eds.

Neff skates on thin ice with his suggestion that Protestants need a greater appreciation for Mary as Theotokos. This title reflects the Alexandrian tendency to confuse the two natures of Christ, thereby undermining his humanity. In the Latin West, Theotokos was translated Dei Genetrix, or "Mother of God," a term that certainly fueled medieval Mariolatry on the popular level. It is possible to reject the Antiochian separation of the two natures of Christ and still suggest that Nestorius's proposal to call Mary Christotokos represented a clearer and more biblical alternative to Theotokos.

AMY'S "REAL LOOK AT LIFE"

I was happy to see CT give Amy Grant's latest album a fair and balanced review in light of CCM's supposed identity crisis ["Where's the Gospel?" Dec. 8]. The only crisis I see is from those in the evangelical community who are pharisaical enough to narrowly define what makes music Christian. I've followed Amy since her first album. I've loved seeing and hearing her raw honesty about life, love, and the universe. She is not diminished as a Christian artist, wife, and mother for sharing a real look at life. I've listened to her critics since she had the chutzpah to "take the cross over" to the secular adult contemporary crowd. Folks seem to forget that she, more than any other Christian artist, has planted seeds of God's love in the hearts of many people who would probably never be reached by the more traditional "Praise and Worship" genre. Personally, I believe love songs to one's child, husband, and friends give plenty of praise and worship to the Lord who brought them all together in the first place.

Kathleen Olsen
Port Orchard, Wash.

■ I agree with William Romanowski's article/review of Amy Grant's new album Behind the Eyes. While I can appreciate the album musically and professionally, its lyric content basically left me wanting to call Amy and ask how her quiet time was going. If these songs come from her life and heart over the past couple of years, what does that say about her Christian walk? The article, however, opened up a new way to see it, and basically put me in my place.

I'm forced to check myself—if I were as vulnerable, what would my music be?

Rick Stilwell
Columbia, S.C.

■ Taking Amy Grant's latest CD out of context from the rest of her music collection is like pulling selections out of Ecclesiastes and accusing the author of secularism. Let's grant Christian artists some freedom of authenticity and receive it within the context of their broader Christian testimony, concerning which Grant's is unquestioned. Had the Israelite community of faith applied the same litmus tests for acceptable music as the contemporary evangelical community, we would not have Song of Solomon in our Bible.

John Hilber
Gig Harbor, Wash.

Most Christian music is about entertainment. Any so-called ministry in and of the music itself is in God's hands, not the entertainer's. I'm not sure all music people would say that, but as one who listens to it all, I will say it because I have tried to get some "Christian" musicians in my church and discovered that they are under the control of the marketers who book them, and their "ministry" is secondary to the "market" that buys the stuff. If you don't believe that, try getting a popular entertainer, Christian or otherwise, in your local small community and you will find a brick wall, commonly known as a "booking agent," who will tell you quickly what matters most—M.O.N.E.Y.—we can book them if you are in the right M.A.R.K.E.T. It's about money, friends—ministry continues to be in God's hands, thankfully.

Pastor Gene Young
First United Methodist Church
Mooresville, Ind.

■ The secularization of Amy Grant's music disappoints me, just as her explicitly Christian music satisfied me. I listen to CCM to hear appealing music that addresses devotional, theological, and practical aspects of my Christian faith. Explicit reference to God, Christ, faith, or related concepts is fundamental. I believe Grant's latest album is so secular that the GMA, CMTA, and RIAA should not classify it as Christian or gospel. Music by a Christian is not necessarily Christian music. If, as the article suggests, one of the main reasons for including Grant's album in these charts is to boost CCM's percentage of the overall market and secure "television coverage, sponsorship, and advertising," then I think the executives making those decisions must grapple with the concept that "you cannot serve God and Mammon."

ONE FEMALE PROFESSOR'S EXPERIENCE

☐ I was discouraged to read "Do Christian Colleges Treat Their Women Faculty Fairly?" [Dec. 8]. I am a female faculty member at a CCCU college, and my experience working in a Christian college has been overwhelmingly positive. Like one of the women quoted, I worked at two secular colleges before coming to Point Loma Nazarene College. My job at PLNC is the most satisfying job I have ever had. The level of encouragement and support that I have received from my colleagues and students (both male and female) has been a great blessing to me.

Many of the concerns and experiences discussed in the article happen in secular institutions as well as Christian colleges. As members of Christian communities, those of us who work in CCCU schools have an obligation to make sure that all voices are heard and that all talents are recognized as gifts from God regardless of gender or race.

*Prof. Maria Zack
San Diego, Calif.*

☐ In the article on women faculty in Christian colleges, I was quoted regarding the tenure of women faculty as saying, "What matters most is the amount of scholarship produced." This should have said, "What matters more (vis à vis student mentoring) is the amount of scholarship produced." Hopefully, what matters most, our first criterion for tenure in Christian colleges, will continue to be biblically based teaching. My point was that its development can be more difficult for women faculty who often bear heavier responsibilities for mentoring female students. There just aren't enough of us to go around.

LIBERTY UNIVERSITY'S DEBT

☐ There is an error in the heading and the News article "$27 Million Payment Trims Debt" [Dec. 8]. Both indicated that the bondholders received $27 million. If that were correct, then the bondholders would have received all of the principal and interest owed to them, and I would not have said what I am quoted as saying. The fact is that the bondholders were owed over $20 million (about $15 million of principal and several million in unpaid interest), but they were not paid nearly that much. None of the bondholders received any of the unpaid interest owed them. The total amount paid to bondholders in 1997 was about half as much as the article indicates they received in September.

*Robert E. Newell, CPA
Former bondholder's committee member Seffner, Fla.*

For the article, Liberty University spokesperson Mark DeMoss provided a payback figure of $27 million. Now, however, Liberty general counsel Jerry Falwell, Jr., says the last group of bondholders to be repaid received only about $15 million. Falwell agrees that no interest was paid in the settlement, only principal.

LET THE PRISONERS WORK

Crime doesn't pay, but prison labor can benefit everyone.

For one key period of his life, Ron Humphrey worked a typical eight-hour day as a computer-systems manager, followed by another four hours after dinner. He worked Saturdays as well.

Humphrey was not working for a cruel, Dickensian boss. As an inmate in a federal prison, Humphrey found his work to be a constructive escape from the ennui of his cell.

Unfortunately, few prison inmates have the opportunity for gainful employment. The federal prison population in the United States has nearly doubled since 1990, and the total U.S. prison population is now almost 1.2 million. Our rate of incarceration is second only to that of Russia. Remarkably, the percentage of prisoners working has dropped dramatically: from about 75 percent in 1885 to about 8 percent in 1995. When modern "penitentiaries" were founded in the 1790s, they were designed on Christian principles, with work as a key force in helping prisoners toward reform. But public concern grew over competition for jobs from the prison labor force, especially with the coming of the Great Depression, during which 33 states passed laws prohibiting the sale of convict-made goods on the open market. Federal laws passed since then prompted an assistant attorney general in Arizona to say, "The original conception of the penitentiary was . . . turned on its head. Prison labor, once viewed as indispensable for restoring a healthy relationship between the criminal and society, was made literally a federal offense."

The sheer volume of prison idleness demands a massive attitudinal shift on the part of society, so that private enterprise will link with public administration for the betterment of offenders and society. The benefits of prison employment (not to be confused with the economic exploitation of offenders) are evident: enhanced mental health for the prisoners, reduced violence, beefed-up family support, preserved marriages, diminished violence and recidivism, and increased restitution paid to victims of crimes.

Humphrey himself is a testimony to these benefits. He has been out of prison nearly a decade and is now circulation manager for the Prison Fellowship publication Inside Journal. Prison work is a mental-health issue, he says. "You keep yourself busy or you go nuts," he told CT.

"You have to look for ways to get through it without your mind being destroyed."

Marilyn Moses of the National Institute of Justice agrees. "From an offender perspective," says Moses, "doing nothing but 'three hots [hot meals] and a cot' is terrible." Indeed, says a Justice Fellowship report, work "can prevent some of the frustration that comes from idleness," frustration that often results in fights and violent assaults. When 85 percent of Minnesota's prison population was working, a Justice Fellowship report points out, it had one of the lowest rates of prison violence in the country.

BEATING THE ODDS

But prisoners who work are not just killing time: they are doing something constructive. In Humphrey's case, work was a way of participating in the life of his family. His six-day work week allowed him to pay the rent for his wife and four children, while she could use income from her nursing-home jobs on medical bills and food. But more significantly, "My monthly check indicated to us that I was still a participating member of the family."

This helped the Humphreys beat the odds: 85 percent of men who go into prison married are divorced by the time they are released. Of the remaining 15 percent, half see their marriages fail within their first year back in society. Humphrey believes his contribution to his family's maintenance created the context of confidence and caring in which his marriage could survive.

Clearly, the social cost of allowing prisoners' families to fall into a pattern of social dependency is enormous, while the payback for investing in prison industries is measured not only in the economic value of goods produced and incarceration subsidies, but also in the incalculable value of families preserved.

PRISONERS WHO PAY

Prison labor also allows for offenders (where appropriate) to make some degree of restitution to their victims. Restitution teaches them that their victims are human like themselves by forging a personal and financial connection between victim and victimizer. Unfortunately, our courts too rarely consider the possibility of prisoners participating in restitution. In 1986, according to a Department of Justice study, 36 percent of felons placed on probation (including 52 percent of burglars) were ordered to pay restitution. But only 14 percent of felons sent to prison were ordered to pay restitution. The courts must realize more fully the potential for inmates to pay, literally, for their crimes.

The maturity that comes from participating in meaningful prison work—not the same as slave labor or chain gangs—shows in recidivism rates. In one study, after release to halfway houses, only 6.6 percent of participants who had worked in prison had their parole revoked or were charged with committing a new crime in their first year of supervised release, compared to 10.1 percent of those who had not worked in prison. Another study found that after three years the recidivism rate of those who had worked for Wisconsin's state prison industries program was 15 percent lower than it was for those who had not.

Given such a positive record for prison industries, who could oppose them? In a strong economy, hardly anybody. Still, prison industries have a long way to go to achieve the effectiveness and public acceptance they should have even though Congress in 1979 relaxed the restrictions against prison industries. In October 1997, for example, certain manufacturing interests rallied around a bill introduced in Congress that would end the requirement that federal agencies should shop first with federal government-run inmate work programs. Perhaps that cozy marketing arrangement with federal agencies should be annulled. But October's protests were framed in terms of prisoners "taking job opportunities away from thousands of honest, hard-working Americans." That's political rhetoric, not reality. Case studies show that when private industry contracts for prison work, American jobs are saved, as low-skill, low-wage tasks are retained in our prisons instead of being shipped outside the country.

We all have choices. As one inmate told Charles Colson, "I can either lie on my prison bunk and cost the taxpayers about $16,000 a year, or I can be out here doing something productive, paying back society." Or as former Chief Justice Burger framed the question: "Do we want prisoners to return to society as predators or as producers?" CI

WIMBER'S WONDERS

When John Wimber, only 63, fell and died of a brain hemorrhage this past November, we were forced to ponder so unceremonious an end for this prominent preacher of divine healing and other wonders. In recent years Wimber had battled cancer, a stroke, and heart disease, for which many interceded on his behalf. Instead of being healed, his weary body was laid in the ground, leaving admirers and critics alike to sort through the considerable legacy he had left to evangelical Christians.

That legacy leaves many uncomfortable—his linking of "signs and wonders" with church growth, his insistence on seeking the gifts of the Spirit, and his contribution to a participatory style of worship that slipped on wings of song through the back doors of even many avowedly noncharismatic churches. In later years, he saw certain groups in his Vineyard movement splinter off into unfortunate extremes. This, says Kevin Springer, a pastor and coauthor with Wimber of Power Healing and Power Evangelism, was largely due to his ministry philosophy of "Let the bush grow and then trim it." Under his leadership the Vineyard churches multiplied to more than 750 fellowships worldwide.

Perhaps Wimber's greatest impact, however, was in reminding the larger evangelical community that certain "Pentecostal emphases" could also be found in the Bible. "He raised the level of expectation of divine action in the life of the church," says J. I. Packer of Regent College, who at times took issue with points in Wimber's teaching. Wayne Grudem, author of The Gift of Prophecy in the New Testament and Today, notes, "He continually talked about the ways we could recognize the Holy Spirit when he manifested himself in people's lives."

Such talk, of course, unsettled those of us whose understandings of the Holy Spirit kept him in a restrictive theological box. So when he died, that skepticism that wants to discount a worker of miracles felt affirmed. This prophet, too, was but a frail mortal.

Yet John Wimber realized his own frailty, never forgetting that he had been a beer-guzzling, drug-abusing pop musician who was converted at the age of 29 while chain-smoking his way through a Quaker-led Bible study. To the extent that he embraced his weaknesses, humbly hearing his critics and asking forgiveness when he had erred (and trimming back the bush when necessary)—to that extent God's power, about which he wrote so much, showed the stronger through him. "Our job is to pray for healing; God's job is to do the healing," Wimber often said, including when he lost his close friend, British charismatic leader David Watson, to cancer after praying fervently for his restoration.

It was this unadorned but theologically astute view of healing that Wimber would want us to remember now in the wake of his early death.

Evangelicals will miss Wimber. And we will recall with gratitude this man who opened himself so transparently to the work of the Holy Spirit that God chose him to teach us what couldn't be found in even the best seminary textbooks. For this reason, John Wimber was, in Packer's words, "a good gift of God to the church." CI

Experience Today's Easiest-to-Understand Accurate Bible Translation.

The New Living Translation always strives to render the meaning of the passage as clearly as possible. Other translations often follow the Greek structure of Paul's words so closely that the clear meaning is difficult to discern. Compare this passage from Galatians 5:1-4:

King James Version:

Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage.² Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing.³ For I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law.⁴ Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace.

New International Version:

It is for freedom that Christ has set us free. Stand firm, then, and do not let yourselves be burdened again by a yoke of slavery.

²Mark my words! I, Paul, tell you that if you let yourselves be circumcised, Christ will be of no value to you at all.³Again I declare to every man who lets himself be circumcised that he is obligated to obey the whole law.⁴You who are trying to be justified by law have been alienated from Christ; you have fallen away from grace.

New Living Translation:

So Christ has really set us free. Now make sure that you stay free, and don't get tied up again in slavery to the law.

²Listen! I, Paul, tell you this: If you are counting on circumcision to make you right with God, then Christ cannot help you.³I'll say it again. If you are trying to find favor with God by being circumcised, you must obey all of the regulations in the whole law of Moses.⁴For if you are trying to make yourselves right with God by keeping the law, you have been cut off from Christ! You have fallen away from God's grace.

Open a copy of the New Living Translation, and you'll know. This is going to be a whole new experience. Because here in your hands is the easiest-to-understand Bible translation you've ever read.

But understandable as it is, the New Living Translation is a truly accurate and faithful translation, the work of ninety world-class scholars laboring for more than seven years. Which makes it perfect for

"HOW MUCH TRUTH CAN WE TAKE?"

*South Africa's Christian experiment for finding healing

L. GREGORY JONES

Laurice Nchabeleng tells the panel and the audience how as a school-boy he was taken to the room where his activist father had just been tortured and killed by the South African security forces. In that room he was ordered to wash his hands in his father's blood.

Stories like Nchabeleng's are surfacing all around South Africa. The country is trying to come to terms with its past. It is a past marked by apartheid and—as we are now learning—atrocities long hidden from view that are now being brought to light. These stories are horrific, yet told in gritty detail.

The storytellers do not sanitize the events, nor are they permitted euphemisms to cover the horrors. The stories are of people being tortured and killed in unspeakable ways, yet now those ways are being spoken. It is not only victims like Nchabeleng recounting the details of their suffering; it is also the torturers, including high-ranking state officials, confessing their crimes.

Even more astonishing, however, is that these stories are not being told in the context of a confessional. Rather, they are being told on the national stage, and in the midst of national and international debates, as South Africa struggles to come to terms with the burdens of its past. In so doing, South Africa is offering to the rest of the world a test of the power, and perhaps the limits, of the Christian vision of reconciliation. For at the heart of the entire process of confessing the truth about the past is the conviction, and the hope, that a renewed future will be possible that is marked more by reconciliation and peace than by recurring cycles of violence and vengeance. For some, that seems too much to ask. For others, it is the most hopeful sign for political life that we have seen in some time. Before we can evaluate its prospects, however, some background is in order.

RECONSTRUCTION OF A NATION

As apartheid ended and Nelson Mandela was released from prison in 1990, South Africa faced the task of reconstructing a society that had been based on divisions and oppression. This entailed dealing with past injustices. First they looked to the ways other countries had formed "truth commissions" to deal with crimes; some even proposed the formation of "Nuremberg trials" for those responsible for apartheid.

However, in the interim constitution of 1993, South Africa committed itself to a program of amnesty. A key passage of that constitution declares: "Amnesty shall be granted in respect of acts, omissions, and offences associated with political objectives and committed in the course of the conflicts of the past."

This principle became a key feature of a bill establishing a Commission on Truth and Reconciliation passed by the South African Parliament on October 21, 1994. This commission linked together amnesty, truth telling, and a goal of reconciliation as key features of one process. The establishment of the commission made clear that South Africa was going to give priority to reconciliation rather than revenge.

Archbishop Desmond Tutu greets witnesses at the Truth and Reconciliation's first hearing, April 15, 1996.

The commission was charged with several tasks:

- to establish "as complete a picture as possible of the nature, causes and extent of gross violations of human rights" during the period from March 1, 1960 (the Sharpeville massacre), to the end of 1993;
- to grant amnesty to "persons who make full disclosure of all the relevant facts relating to acts associated with a political objective" in that period;
- to give victims "an opportunity to relate the violations they suffered";
- to take measures of reparation, rehabilitation, and the restoration of "human and civil dignity" to the victims;

- to report to the nation on its findings;
- and, finally, to make recommendations aimed at the prevention of similar violations in the future.

Obviously, such a momentous and monumental undertaking could succeed only if great care was given to the processes under which the commission would do its work. Amidst many crucial decisions, three have proven pivotal: first, the selection of Archbishop Desmond Tutu to head the commission; second, the careful yet rigorous process by which the various commissioners were chosen; third, the insistence that the entire truth be told, including the sins and crimes committed by the victims of apartheid.

THE GOOD BISHOP

Archbishop Tutu is widely respected throughout South Africa. His gentle spirit, firm convictions, and tireless passion have served the entire process extremely well. Even more, Tutu's adherence to the South African notion of ubuntu, which stresses the interdependence of humanity and our need for reconciliation, undergirds his Christian theology and has guided him throughout the commission's work (see Michael Battle, Reconciliation: The Ubuntu Theology of Desmond Tutu for more on this theme). Tutu has been able to command widespread respect among diverse and opposite groups within South Africa.

This is also the case with the various commissioners selected to serve on the panels charged with listening to the stories and making decisions about requests for amnesty. One of the chief criteria employed in selecting commissioners was that they needed to have credibility with their own people and credibility among other groups. This scrutiny took a great deal of time and required extensive examination of the long lists of people nominated by the public to serve.

The selection panel included a representative from each of the major political parties, two church leaders, a trade unionist, and two lawyers with expertise in the area of human rights. This panel considered more than 600 names and selected 45 people for public interviews. Anyone could offer objections to any of the candidates. The selection panel developed a final list of 25 names that was presented to President Mandela. He consulted with his cabinet and then selected the final group of 18 commissioners. As a result of this careful discernment process, there has been a high level of trust in the work of the commissioners.

Perhaps most significant in the work of the commission has been the insistence that the entire truth must be told. Tutu has consistently refused to allow the focus to be only on the crimes of white South Africans. Of course, this is not a blanket assertion that "we are all sinners" and so all in need of absolution. There is no doubt that the crimes of the Afrikaner regime, and of the adherents of apartheid, far exceeded the crimes of the African National Congress and other resistance groups. This is true whether the crimes are measured quantitatively or by the seriousness of the offenses.

At the same time, however, Tutu has insisted that South Africans cannot ignore or cover over the horrors committed by those resisting or seeking to overthrow an unjust regime. If truth telling and amnesty are to be linked to reconciliation, then the whole truth must be confessed. This requires a willingness to examine our own hearts, minds, and lives—whether we are investigating the horrors of South Africa and elsewhere or the particularities of our own lives in less dramatically sinful parts of the world.

SHATTERING REVELATIONS

The process of truth telling has been painful. Tutu himself has often been reduced to tears by the stories he hears told. In an interview, Tutu asks: "What would you do, if you were a mother and you sat there and you heard that your son had been put into a minibus, plied with alcohol, and then, on the border between your country and a foreign country, had some stuff injected into him, and the minibus was then packed with explosives and your son was blown to smithereens?"

"One is shattered in many ways by the revelations," Tutu continues, "but on the other side you are almost exhilarated by how most people have responded to the truth. But I have quite seriously wondered how much truth we can tolerate."

Thus far, South Africa's national culture seems to have been able to tolerate an astonishing level of truthfulness. Yet it has also been accompanied by questions, reservations, and pointed objections. Some worry that amnesty offers cheap reconciliation, particularly since those who confess do not have to express either remorse or repentance. Many, in fact, do express remorse, but that is not the point. Those who do not seem to be getting away with murder—literally.

True, the commitment to amnesty was made as part of the political negotiations that enabled a peaceful transition from apartheid to democratic rule. That is, amnesty was made a precondition of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission, not a result of careful deliberations by the commission about how best to come to terms with the past. This fuels suspicion that South African politicians secured the promise of amnesty not only as a means of legitimately avoiding unjust (though understandable) reprisals, but also illegitimately to avoid accountability.

Even so, two other features of the process work to allay such suspicion. First, there is neither a blanket amnesty for all crimes nor is there a guarantee of amnesty for any particular crime. Persons must come before the commission to confess their specific offenses, and they must petition the commission for amnesty. In order to grant amnesty, the commission must be convinced that:

"One is shattered in many ways by the revelations," Tutu explains.

"I have quite seriously wondered how much truth we can tolerate."

- the act(s) involved a political objective;
- the act(s) took place during the time period designated by the commission (1960–93);
- the act(s) committed were proportional to the political objective being sought;
- and that the perpetrator has confessed the whole truth.

People had only until the end of 1997 to come forward with confessions for the purpose of amnesty. (The period has since been extended through April 1998 to accommodate the response.)

Second, and closely related, the very process of requiring personal, public confession requires an accountability that we ought not underestimate. Particularly in the United States, people are tempted to equate accountability with publicly sanctioned punishment. In that sense, South Africa's amnesty allows the perpetrators to go free. But it also has required them to confess the truth of what they have done. This involves courage, and it also enables South Africans and the whole world to have a public reckoning of the past.

OBJECTIONS OVERRULED

This approach to dealing with atrocities from the past presses another objection to the work of the commission. Many people worry that this commission, both through its offer of amnesty and its focus on reconciliation, undermines the importance of justice. For some, the problem is that it seems too soon for forgiveness. As one woman describes the torture and death of her son, she concludes: "I do not know if I can forgive. I must know who did this to my son. When I see the face of the one who killed him, and he tells me why, then perhaps I can forgive."

Others have more pointed objections to the very idea of forgiveness. They do not want forgiveness at all; they want justice and, perhaps, even vengeance. They hear the true stories told of what perpetrators did to them or their loved ones, and they are filled with anger and desires for vengeance. They do not want reconciliation with these offenders; if they cannot have publicly sanctioned vengeance, they at least desire lawfully recognized justice. It is difficult to disagree, particularly since doing so may seem to be heaping further burdens on people already victimized in horrifying ways.

Archbishop Tutu has responded to these objections by drawing a contrast between retributive and restorative justice. The commission emphasizes reconciliation over retributive justice, but it does so in the interest of restorative justice. In part, they are bound to do so by the commitment to amnesty. At the same time, however, it is not clear that an alternative would have been preferable. Public trials on the order of Nuremberg would have been extraordinarily costly, and there is no guarantee that such trials would have necessarily produced either the truth or convictions of the perpetrators.

At a deeper level, the commission's focus on restorative justice seems closely allied to the process Jesus embodies in the Gospels. His primary concern throughout his life, death, and resurrection was offering forgiveness that aims not at retributive but rather restorative justice. The commission does not punish the offenders, but it does offer victims an opportunity both to tell their stories and to seek reparations for their suffering. Cheap rec-is too high a price for political culture, and we ought not permit what one South African victim characterized as "the imposition of a Christian morality of forgiveness" into a political process. As Timothy Garton Ash put it, when "taken to the extreme, the reconciliation of all with all is a deeply illiberal idea" (The New York Review of Books, July 17, 1997). Ash asks, "Would it not be more realistic to define a more modest goal: peaceful coexistence, cooperation, tolerance?"

Presumably, democracy in the Western world represents the embodiment of this more modest goal. Rather than imposing ideals of forgiveness and reconciliation on a political culture, we ought

States, the most hopeful signs for progress in dealing with racism are coming not from the broader liberal culture of tolerance, but from Christians who believe that racial reconciliation is a task incumbent on all those who worship the God of Jesus Christ.

This does not mean, of course, that we will achieve reconciliation of all with all. I do not know what Ash means by his worry about taking the goal of reconciliation "to the extreme." There will likely be people in virtually any social setting with whom we will not be reconciled. However, that does not diminish the goal.

Christians are enjoined to struggle to "love your enemies" and even to "pray for those who persecute you." This seems a modest and realistic, though no less challenging, goal for those situations in which reconciliation is not currently conceivable. But unlike Ash and others, this does not diminish the focus on truthful reconciliation as the larger horizon that guides and structures our dealings with one other. Without that horizon, "peaceful coexistence" glosses over and evades the realities of our conflicts and masks the desires for retribution and vengeance that so often infect our relationships.

onciliation might deny justice of any kind; however, a Christian understanding of reconciliation, and of the relationship between justice and forgiveness, is well served by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's careful process of linking reconciliation with each person's confessing the whole truth of what that person did or had done to him or her.

Moreover, we ought not to lose sight of the dramatic and significant stories of victims or victims' families offering forgiveness to the perpetrators when the perpetrators confess their crimes. Over and over again, people have responded to horrifying stories about their loved ones, not with desires for retribution, but with gestures of forgiveness and hope for a future not bound by the destructiveness of the past. While we cannot expect all victims to be ready to desire and offer forgiveness, neither should we minimize the power and drama of people whose gestures offer signs of God's inbreaking kingdom.

Yet this presses perhaps the most pointed objection to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission: Reconciliation to be satisfied with processes that preserve tolerance without requiring the embrace of strangers, much less enemies. This may seem to be a more modest goal, but does it really provide peaceful coexistence? What is the record of the United States in dealing with the legacies of slavery? Are the wounds healing, albeit slowly, or do we simply find ways of avoiding the open sores? The answer is undoubtedly a portion of both, yet I am not convinced that the "liberal" modest goal of peaceful coexistence, cooperation, and tolerance is sufficient.

Indeed, the model of "peaceful coexistence" seems these days to be masking a despair in African-American communities that whites do not really care about their plight. Perhaps addressing the realities of our social conflicts—whether in the United States, in South Africa, or in Bosnia—requires the risks of challenging people to imagine a higher goal, of forgiveness and reconciliation. This goal enables people to be prodded out of comfortable illusions about tolerance into a more costly, but also more life-giving, struggle toward truthful reconciliation. In the United

THE COMMISSION'S TRUTHS

I confess that I find the Truth and Reconciliation process one of the most dramatic and hopeful signs of an authentically Christian contribution to political life to emerge in many years. To be sure, there are many challenges yet to be faced, and moral and political minefields yet to be traversed. Even so, there are important insights that we can glean not only as observers, but also as participants in our own churches and in political contexts in our neighborhoods, schools, states, and our country. Three insights, if taken seriously, could faithfully transform our lives and our interactions with others.

First, there can be no healing of the past without truthful confession. We must abandon our attempts to rationalize what we have done or to blame others (particularly victims) or to excuse ourselves, and confront truthfully what we have done or had done to us. Such confession must be public in the sense that we test our judgments in the presence of others. But in a culture in which our public discourse seems all too contingent upon evading the truth or deceiving others, and in which studies indicate that

I spent most of the summer of 1996 in South Africa, living in a small cottage, doing research, participating in a National Endowment for the Humanities seminar, and talking to as many South Africans as I could. Aside from my five-year-old son telling me that he had eaten "poodle" for lunch at the Zulu preschool he was attending, my most memorable experience was attending hearings of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission.

These hearings are highly structured in a liturgical fashion. Each hearing is opened with a prayer—sometimes Christian, sometimes Muslim, sometimes Jewish—and a large, white candle representing truth is solemnly lit. The audience is then asked to rise out of respect for the victims and their families when they file in. In typical court settings, spectators would rise when the judge comes in; here we rose for the victims. The seven commissioners in attendance then came down from their white linen-clad tables to welcome the victims—by shaking hands, embracing, kissing. Many of the victims were already sobbing, overcome by the mere fact that an official government representative was showing them respect.

As each victim, often accompanied by two or three family members, went up to testify, a psychotherapist sat by his or her side. Before the testimony began, one commissioner asked about the victim's family—parents, spouse, children, siblings—their names, ages, where they lived, how they were employed. This was more than a strategic ploy to put the victim at ease; rather, this ritual grounded or located the victim as a person in the fullest African sense—with a family, a community, a place.

Then the story was told. I sat for two long days, spellbound, horrified yet mesmerized by riveting accounts of intimidation, assault, abduction, rape, torture, and murder. Since this was not a trial, there was no cross-examination. But the commissioners did ask questions at the end of each story, and during these question periods they often attempted to elicit the names of perpetrators and corroborating witnesses. At the conclusion of the testimony, the commissioners always asked what kind of reparation the victim was requesting. This was for legal purposes, in order to get these claims on record, but the final reparations will probably be more symbolic than sizable, given South Africa's depressed economy.

I was astonished that the victims' requests for reparations were so minimal: one woman wanted a plaque put up where her husband died; a young man, confined to a wheelchair because of a bullet in his spine, asked for financial assistance to attend college; a weeping mother said, "I have no particular request, I just wish to know who killed my son." A woman about my age testified about the assassination of her husband, an African National Congress (ANC) community leader, who was shot while driving on the beautiful road that stretches through the valleys between Pietermaritzburg and Ixhopo, the town that Alan Paton describes so lyrically in Cry, the Beloved Country. She was left with five young children. "I wanted to kill all my children and myself," she said. "Sometimes, I still do."

With one exception, every victim I heard testify during two days in Pietermaritzburg understood his or her life as part of the Christian story and described suffering and endurance with Christian rhetoric. Biblical citations, references to impassioned prayer, narrow escapes attributed to God's miraculous intervention were commonly heard. "When I think of the things that have happened," one matronly woman said with great dignity, "I just open the Bible and pray Psalm 71."

When each victim finished, one of the commissioners responded with a formal statement, summing up the story that had been told, affirming and thanking the witness, pronouncing on the evil that had been done. "We have a system that needs overhauling, a system that needs to re-earn your trust," one said in thanks to the witness. "Testimony such as yours will assist in the process of creating a just system." "May the Lord help you through these hardships," concluded another.

The Truth and Reconciliation Human Rights hearings are an unusual instance in which the "hard-to-see" have been made visible. Apartheid South Africa was deliberately structured in numerous legal, social, cultural, and economic ways to silence those who were demonized as "other." The TRC process, in response, was designed to restore "the human and civil dignity" of the victims of apartheid by giving them a collective opportunity to tell their stories, to fashion new public narratives and identities.

Given the significant role that the Christian church played in both the creation of and struggle against apartheid, it is fitting that this attempt to exorcise the past draw on the Christian tradition. South African theologian John De Gruchy says, "The Christian understanding of repentance, forgiveness, and reparation is of fundamental importance in shaping a national consciousness that can heal the land, achieve genuine reconciliation, and build a moral and democratic culture." In this public, communal act of confession, South Africa is beginning to create a new national identity. CT most of us tell at least two lies a day, such a commitment requires that we renew our commitment to truthful confession.

Second, truthful confession will only be life-giving if we can trust that others are more interested in forgiveness, reconciliation, and restorative justice than in retribution. Christian confession requires that we focus our attention on healing the brokenness that has occurred rather than on punishing those who have done wrong. This does require accountability, but we ought not let it become an occasion for retribution, much less ven-we all can summon inspiration.

Tutu's commitment has been recently tested by the intransigence of two of South Africa's most visible political leaders: the African National Congress's Winnie Madikizela-Mandela and former president P. W. Botha.

Tutu has known the Mandela family for many years, including through some of the worst of the apartheid era. When Ms. Madikizela-Mandela, now divorced from Nelson Mandela, came before the Truth and Reconciliation Commission in October of 1997, Tutu greeted her warmmatic moments of the hearings, Paul Verryn, now a Methodist bishop in South Africa, approached Madikizela-Mandela and told her that he had been searching for a time and place to forgive her for her false accusations. She responded coolly through her lawyer: not here in public, adding that Verryn would have known where to find her.

Madikizela-Mandela neither accepted responsibility nor expressed any willingness to ask forgiveness from those she had wronged. Yet she has hoped to maintain strength as a political leader for the future, even running for deputy president of the ruling African National Congress. How will the people respond to one whom they have loved and respected for so long, yet whose character now seems so questionable?

On the other hand, P. W. Botha, South Africa's former president and one of the architects of apartheid, has refused even to appear before the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. He has refused because, in his eyes, he has nothing for which he has to apologize. In accordance with the law establishing the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, Botha's case will now be turned over to the courts. Botha's stubborn resolve has made him a hero to those white South Africans who regard the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's work as a one-sided persecution conducted by the victors.

These cases in particular will test the resolve of Archbishop Tutu, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, and the South African people. Can they find the will to retain their commitment to truthfulness, even if some of their most visible leaders refuse to participate? Or will they—and we—find it easier to give up hope, returning to a supposedly “realistic” but ultimately cynical posture that all we can expect is tolerance of one another's failings? Sustaining such hope will continue to be hard work. Yet it is well worth the effort, for nothing less than faithful witness to God's ministry of reconciliation is at stake.

geance. This will require re-evaluation of our attitudes toward punishment in our legal system, but it should also occasion some searching reflections about practices within our own congregations and our own personal relationships.

Third, in the absence of reconciliation, we need nonetheless to struggle to find processes that enable us to retain our commitment to truthful confession and reconciliation even while acknowledging the persistence of division and conflict. Central to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's success has been the care with which it has undertaken its deliberations, a care marked by the larger horizons of truth and reconciliation. Moreover, the commission has sought faithfully to maintain credibility with all parties to the disputes.

We need to find similar ways of ensuring credible processes in our own practices within the church and in the broader culture, and to explore ways of keeping the horizons of truth and reconciliation ever before us, even—indeed, especially—when we are inclined to hate and destroy our enemies rather than to love them. Archbishop Tutu's steadfast commitment stands as a remarkable witness from which

ly. He recalled her signal contributions to the struggle against apartheid. He also pleaded with her to acknowledge and confess the full truth of her complicity in the violence, injustice, and terror conducted in her name in the late 1980s.

Almost three dozen people testified that Madikizela-Mandela was behind several brutal tortures, abductions, and murder committed by young men who worked for her in the township of Soweto. During that time, in 1989, Madikizela-Mandela sought to deflect suspicions by falsely accusing a Methodist pastor, Paul Verryn, of sodomizing young men. One of those closest to her, Jerry Richardson, testified to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission that Madikizela-Mandela ordered the abduction of a suspected informant, 14-year-old Stompie Seipei, and then oversaw his torture and murder at Richardson's hands.

Yet Madikizela-Mandela has acknowledged only that “things went horribly wrong.” She has denied any responsibility or complicity, even after listening to weeks of testimony from those who had been close to her during the struggles against apartheid. In one of the more dra-

If reconciliation can happen in South Africa, it can happen elsewhere.

DESMOND TUTU

Desmond Tutu is archbishop in the Anglican Church in South Africa and head of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. In this article he gives his own account of the commission's efforts to work toward reconciliation in his native land. It is adapted from a speech he gave to the South African Press Club, October 1997.

Sadly, there are significant sectors in South Africa that have made it their business to denigrate, vilify, ridicule, and misrepresent the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) and its work. They decided long ago, in advance of any evidence to support their position, that the commission was a witch hunt directed at one particular community, that a certain group had already been condemned collectively, that it was really an instrument to advance the political interests of one political party, and that in its composition the TRC was heavily weighted in favor of those who supported that political party. Evidence to refute these allegations and accusations has not made any difference at all.

Almost all those who oppose the TRC benefited from apartheid. Nearly every party has criticized the TRC whenever our spotlight has revealed something embarrassing to that party. Most of the victims, black and white, have largely been supportive of the TRC process.

There have been those who have been vociferous in asserting that the TRC, far from promoting reconciliation, has in fact done the opposite. They say it has engendered resentment and anger, opened old wounds, and fostered alienation. I have challenged those who have made these assertions to provide evidence that would support their claims, because our experience has been the direct opposite. It has been almost breathtaking, this willingness to forgive, this magnanimity, this nobility of spirit. No, this process has made a contribution to reconciliation, to healing, as our mandate says. The TRC is required not to achieve unity and reconcile our nation—it is required to promote, to contribute to it.

Let us look at some instances. In Bisho [the capital of the homeland Ciskei], some former Ciskei Defence Force officers testified about the Bisho massacre [where 29 people were killed and as many as 200 were injured in a 1992 march to protect political repression; the Ciskei Defence Force had opened fire when ANC demonstrators left the planned route and ran toward the city center]. One of the officers had already alienated the people with his insensitive tirade. Then another confessed his part and asked for forgiveness. In the audience were people who had been wounded in that incident, people who had lost loved ones, but when that white army officer asked for forgiveness they did not rush to strangle or assault him. Unbelievably, they applauded. Yes, this is a crazy country. I said at that point, let us keep silent, because we were in the presence of something special, of something holy. Many times I have felt we should take our shoes off because we were standing on holy ground.

At the first amnesty hearing in Rustenburg [the site of a brutal political murder in 1990; the victim's house was surrounded by ten men who beat and strangled him when he came out of his house and later chopped his body into pieces to destroy the evidence], the community there, including the children of the man who had been murdered, said they supported the murderers' application for amnesty because it was crucial for advancing reconciliation. This is a crazy country; if miracles had to happen anywhere, then it's here that they would have to happen. No other country has been prayed for as much as this one.

Then there was the white woman victim who was attacked on a golf course. She was so badly injured her children had to teach her to do things we take for granted. She still can't go through security check points at airports because she has so much shrapnel in her body. She said, "I would like to meet the perpetrator in a spirit of forgiveness." That's wonderful! She goes on, "I would like to forgive him," and then quite incredibly she adds, "and I hope he will forgive me." Crazy.

Then there was the Afrikaner father whose toddler son was killed in the African National Congress (ANC) Amanzimtoti Wimpy Bar bomb attack. He said he believed his son had contributed to the coming of the new dispensation; or the Afrikaner woman in Klerksdorp who testified about the abduction of her husband by libertarian army operatives and said her grief and loss were just a drop in the ocean compared to what other people have suffered in this beautiful traumatized land; or the daughter who, after hearing all the gruesome details of how her father had been killed, said in a hushed East London City Hall: "We would like to forgive; we just want to know whom to forgive." Incredible.

After the first hearing in East London, the brother of Matthew Goniwe [a political activist at the forefront of the antiapartheid struggle until his brutal murder in 1985; some of the highest officials in the apartheid government were implicated in this case, although no one was ever convicted] came to me and said, "We have told our story many, many times already. But this is the first time that, after telling it, it is as if a huge weight has been lifted from our shoulders." That was unsolicited. And there were the families whose loved ones were missing; it turned out they had been abducted, killed, and secretly buried. The TRC was able to exhume the remains, and the families were able to give a decent burial and so, too, experience closure. They thanked the TRC that this could happen.

The TRC process has helped to expose the real truth about atrocities during apartheid, and this surely is helping to heal. Ignorance and lies exacerbate the anguish of the survivors or the victims.

One week in October we had an extraordinary thing happen when four former cabinet ministers from the apartheid government testified in the State Security Council hearing. We could say they did not tell us who gave orders to kill, but that would really be to split hairs. Just note what they did say. They said apartheid had no moral basis. It was an immoral policy. They said they accepted political and moral responsibility. They said they could not say they did not know. That is a great deal more than anyone has said so far, and they did not evacuate their apology by letting it die the death of a thousand qualifications. They said they apologized unreservedly. They have contributed hugely to the process of healing and reconciliation because they have accepted moral and political responsibility. It has happened nowhere else in the world that former government ministers should appear before such a commission and give an account of themselves.

My friends, it is never easy to say, "I am sorry; forgive me, I was wrong." As humans we are forever trying to rationalize, to excuse the wrong we have done. Adam blamed Eve, and she blamed the snake. These ministers have said they are sorry, and for that they should be warmly commended.

No, I am not making it up. Five top judges on behalf of the judiciary past and present declare that apartheid, which these people supported enthusiastically, was in itself a gross violation of human rights. You couldn't have it more forthrightly than that, and the judges almost by definition can't be accused of political or any other bias. I am in very good company when I have said apartheid was intrinsically evil, immoral, and unchristian. That is not a bias—it is stating a fact now endorsed by the top legal people in our country.

Those who deride the TRC hardly ever refer to an amazing phenomenon—the victim's readiness, indeed eagerness, to forgive. Many are seemingly taking it for granted—as something almost to which they are entitled.

We are singularly fortunate, indeed blessed, in this country. We could so easily have gone the way of Angola, the Sudan, Bosnia, Northern Ireland, Sri Lanka, the Middle East, which have found peace so devastatingly elusive. We have been fortunate that Mr. de Klerk was so brave in 1990 and that he had to deal with the extraordinary Madiba [Nelson Mandela], so magnanimous, so forgiving.

I used to say to whites: "I am as committed to white liberation as I am to black liberation. Whites won't be free until we are free." They thought I was spewing irresponsible slogans. We won a victory for everyone, black and white. Now we have all been liberated. Freedom is indivisible. Come share in the process of healing, in the process of reconciliation. If this commission fails, you may not be around to describe it. Reconciliation is a national project. We should all be involved. Those others are not doing their people a favor. Get out of your ghetto of self-pity, of not acknowledging how lucky we all are.

Blacks still get up from their shanty settlements and go to work for white people in affluent suburbs. At night they return to the squalor of their homes, on unlit streets, with no running water, no clinics, no schools, no decent homes. They actually go back to all that and don't go on a rampage in the largely white pockets of comfort and affluence. Yet, all some whites do is moan about their loss of power.

Please, God, give me a moving eloquence to persuade my white compatriots. Come eagerly, come enthusiastically, and join the healing, the reconciling side. Your ultimate survival depends on it. Come, please.

We are going to succeed—why? Because God wants us to succeed for the sake of God's world. We will succeed in spite of ourselves, because we are such an unlikely bunch. Who could ever have thought we would ever be an example, except of awfulness? Who could ever have thought we would be held up as a model to the rest of the world—not eminently virtuous—clearly not with an evil system. Not too bright. God wants to say to the world, to Bosnia, to Northern Ireland, et cetera: Look at them. They had a nightmare called apartheid. It has ended. Your nightmare too will end. They had what was called an intractable problem. They are solving it. No one anywhere can any longer say their problem is intractable. We are a beacon of hope for God's world, and we will succeed.

EXPOSING THE

THAT CHRISTIANS SHOULD NOT HAVE

EMOTIONAL PROBLEMS

DWIGHT L. CARLSON

The only army that shoots its wounded is the Christian army," said the speaker, a psychologist who had just returned from an overseas ministry trip among missionaries. He summed up the philosophy of the group he worked with as:

1. We don't have emotional problems. If any emotional difficulties appear to arise, simply deny having them.

2. If we fail to achieve this first ideal and can't ignore a problem, strive to keep it from family members and never breathe a word of it outside the family.

3. If both of the first two steps fail, still don't seek professional help.

I have been a Christian for 50 years, a physician for 29, and a psychiatrist for 15. Over this time I have observed these same attitudes throughout the church—among lay leaders, pastors, priests, charismatics, fundamentalists, and evangelicals alike. I have also found that many not only deny their problems but are intolerant of those with emotional difficulties. Many judge that others' emotional problems are the direct result of personal sin. This is a harmful view.

At any one time, up to 15 percent of our population is experiencing significant emotional problems. For them our churches need to be sanctuaries of healing, not places where they must hide their wounds.

THE EMOTIONAL-HEALTH GOSPEL

Several years ago my daughter was battling leukemia. While lying in bed in the hospital, she received a letter, which read in part:

Dear Susan,

You do not know me personally, but I have seen you in church many times. . . . I have interceded on your behalf and I know the Lord is going to heal you if you just let Him. Do not let Satan steal your life—do not let religious tradition rob you of what Jesus did on the cross—by His stripes we were healed.

The theology behind this letter reminded me of a bumper sticker I once saw: "Health and Prosperity: Your Divine Right." The letter writer had bought into a "healing in the Atonement" theology that most mainstream evangelicals reject. According to this traditional faith-healing perspective, Christ's atonement provides healing for the body and mind just as it offers forgiveness of sins for the soul. The writer meant well, but the letter created tremendous turmoil for my daughter.

While evangelicals have largely rejected "health and wealth" preaching—that faithful Christians will always prosper physically and financially—many hold to an insidious variation of that prosperity gospel. I call it the "emotional-health gospel." The emotional-health gospel assumes that if you have repented of your sins, prayed correctly, and spent adequate time in God's Word, you will have a sound mind and be free of emotional problems. Usually the theology behind the emotional-health gospel does not go so far as to locate emotional healing in the Atonement (though some do) but rather to redefine mental illnesses as "spiritual" or as character problems, which the church or the process of sanctification can handle on its own. The problem is, this is a false gospel, one that needlessly adds to the suffering of those already in turmoil.

This prejudice against those with emotional problems can be seen in churches across the nation on any Sunday morning. We pray publicly for the parishioner with cancer or a heart attack or pneumonia. But rarely will we pray publicly for Mary with severe depression, Charles with incapacitating panic attacks, or the minister's son with schizophrenia. Our silence subtly conveys that these are not acceptable illnesses for Christians to have.

The emotional-health gospel is also communicated by some of our most listened-to leaders. I heard one national speaker make the point that "At the cross you can be made whole. Isaiah said that 'through his stripes we are healed' . . . not of physical suffering, which one day we will experience; we are healed of emotional and spiritual suffering at the cross of Jesus Christ." In other words, a victorious Christian will be emotionally healthy. This so-called full gospel, which proclaims that healing of the body and mind is provided for all in the Atonement, casts a cruel judgment on the mentally ill.

Two authors widely read in evangelical circles, John MacArthur and Dave Hunt, also propagate views that, while sincerely held, I fear lead us to shoot our wounded. In his book Beyond Seduction, Hunt writes, "The average Christian is not even aware that to consult a psychotherapist is much the same as turning oneself over to the priest of any other rival religion," and, "There is no such thing as a mental illness; it is either a physical problem in the brain (such as a chemical imbalance or nutritional deficiency) or it is a moral or spiritual problem."

MacArthur, in Our Sufficiency in Christ, presents the thesis that "As Christians, we find complete sufficiency in Christ and his provisions for our needs." While I agree with his abstract principle, I disagree with how he narrows what are the proper "provisions." A large portion of the book strongly criticizes psychotherapy as one of the "deadly influences that undermine your spiritual life." He denounces "so-called Christian psychologists and psychiatrists who testified that the Bible alone does not contain sufficient help to meet people's deepest personal and emotional needs," and he asserts, "There is no such thing as a 'psychological problem' unrelated to spiritual or physical causes. God supplies divine resources sufficient to meet all those needs completely." Physically caused emotional problems, he adds, are rare, and referring to those who seek psychological help, he concludes: "Scripture hasn't failed them—they've failed Scripture."

A PLACE FOR PROFESSIONALS

When adherents of the emotional-health gospel say that every human problem is spiritual at root, they are undeniably right. Just as Adam's fall in the garden was spiritual in nature, so in a very true sense the answer to every human problem—whether a broken leg or a burdened heart—is to be found in the redeeming work of Christ on the cross. The disease and corruption process set into motion by the Fall affected not only our physical bodies but our emotions as well, and we are just beginning to comprehend the many ways our bodies and minds have been affected by original sin and our fallen nature. Yet the issue is not whether our emotional problems are spiritual or not—all are, at some level—but how best to treat people experiencing these problems.

Many followers of the emotional-health gospel make the point that the church is, or at least should be, the expert in spiritual counseling, and I agree. Appropriate spiritual counseling will resolve issues such as salvation, forgiveness, personal morality, God's will, the scriptural perspective on divorce, and more. It can also help some emotional difficulties. But many emotional or mental illnesses require more than a church support network can offer.

I know it sounds unscriptural to say that some individuals need more than the church can offer—but if my car needs the transmission replaced, do I expect the church to do it? Or if I

New Life Clinics' Steve Arterburn talks about why we are reluctant to be transparent about our problems.

MICHAEL HUDSON

For those who believe psychology is an enemy of the faith, Steve Arterburn is target number one. As cofounder of New Life Clinics, which absorbed the Minirth-Meier organization in 1984, Arterburn oversees 85 clinics in North America. New Life is the largest Christian provider of psychiatric and psychological services, offering both inpatient and outpatient care. Because of New Life and Minirth-Meier, evangelicals are much more comfortable calling a therapist for help than we were a generation ago.

Despite being the author of 25 books dealing mostly with psychological issues and being the host of a national daily radio program dealing with people's problems, Arterburn himself is not a psychologist but a licensed minister. Still, he has taken on the mantle as the most visible apologist for psychology among evangelical Christians.

How did your interest in psychology and counseling develop?

An early hero of mine was Gertrude Behanna. When I was 12, my father gave me one of her recordings. In it she talked about how she had been very wealthy, lived in the Waldorf Astoria, and eventually became an alcoholic. Later, while recovering from her alcoholism, she opened up her mansions for other alcoholics to live in. She said something that never left me: "Once I began to recover I no longer looked down on people; but then I had the final battle that I had to fight, and that was looking down on people who looked down on people." I thought that that was such a wonderful statement of truth, that she was going deep. I had been raised around a lot of people who never went that deep into their own motives, their own character defects.

Another formative experience was meeting a recovering alcoholic during a seminar on recovery groups at Southwestern Seminary. That led me to work at an alcohol- and drug-treatment center in Fort Worth. So I got trained in addiction and really fell in love with working with addicts. I loved working with them because of their lack of pretense. When an old redneck Texas cowboy came in with puke all over him and just completely out of his mind, it was very difficult for him to put on a façade the next morning. I had lived all my life around people in the church who acted like their act was together, so I found that very refreshing.

Why are recovery groups effective in battling pretense?

Because in an AA group there is someone there, someone who's been around, to tell somebody else to sit down and shut up when they become inappropriate. In church, to tell somebody, "I'm not going to put up with this superficiality anymore" wouldn't be considered "Christian"; and so in being nice to people, we let them be superficial.

Let me give you a personal example. When my wife and I got married, the sexual intimacy of our marriage wasn't working. We were involved in a support group of four other couples who were older than us, but after one year we began to feel it was a waste of our time to attend. One week my wife said to me, "Next week we're either going to talk about our problem or we're not going to be involved with this group."

The next week she did, explaining that you could count the times we had attempted sexual intimacy on one hand. At the time, we didn't know that thousands of couples experience this in their twentieth year of marriage, much less their first. We just wanted help and felt these older couples could give us some insight. But their only response was to finish off the evening with a polite "Oh, we're so concerned, and we want to pray for you."

As it turned out, my wife's authenticity was such a threat that they never came back, and the group ended. Something that could have had a wonderful impact on our lives and could have been an invitation for the others to open up became a horrible experience. Because of the humiliation and rejection we felt, my wife and I didn't deal with our problem for another year.

Seen theologically, this kind of posturing is idolatry—worshiping polished, unblemished images we have created of ourselves for others to see and adore.

What prevents us from sharing our problems more openly at church?

Just look at what invitation to conversion we use: "Come to Jesus, and your life is going to be wonderful. It's going to be great, fantastic. All these problems are going to go away." There's some truth to that, but when you hear Dietrich Bonhoeffer say, "When Christ calls a man, he bids him come and die," that's the reality that I've seen in the Christian faith.

I have problems now I would never have had if I hadn't accepted Christ. There's guilt that I've experienced that I would never even have thought twice about. We have to be realistic with people and tell them that when you come to Jesus, there is a new purpose and a fulfillment, but the struggle is going to continue. We have so many lukewarm Christians or people who turn away from the faith because they've been promised this ease.

I was in Hawaii doing a conference for pastors. I'm very self-disclosing in everything that I do, and I shared my testimony about how I had paid for an abortion when I was younger, had lived a promiscuous lifestyle, and had reaped the consequences of my actions—describing what happens in a life when you are in control versus God being in control. Afterwards, a minister of a very large congregation told me, "I can never confess to any struggle unless I've already experienced victory over the struggle." Congregations and pastors need to overcome such false ideals. Those that do will strike a blow against the pretentiousness we're talking about here.

I think that's part of the appeal of pastors like Willow Creek's Bill Hybels or your pastor at Saddle Back, Rick Warren. They seem to share their struggles openly and appropriately.

Definitely. When someone says to Rick, "I really don't know if I love my wife," he responds, "Really! I used to hate my wife. You're in much better shape than we were!" Then he talks about the struggles they had. That's inviting to people.

Churches need to allow pastors to have problems. History shows that when a church doesn't allow a pastor to have little problems, many times those pastors go out and get really big ones.

Why do some churches oppose Christian psychology?

Let me say first that I would agree with much of the criticism leveled against Christian psychology 20 years ago. There were many calling themselves Christian psychologists, but there was nothing Christian about what they did. They just happened to go to church on Sunday—and some of them weren't even Christians.

But today it's a totally different picture. Over the past 15 years Christians have begun to take psychology back. You've got more marriage and family counselors coming out of Christian colleges than you do from secular colleges. They have a biblical spiritual foundation, which is only right because real psychology is biblical. Psychology means the study of the soul. And while there are ideas within the broader practice that are false, those don't negate the things that are true.

What makes the Christian therapeutic community stand out today from much of secular counseling is its goal: not to help people feel good or cope, but to come to the end of themselves. The goal is not to help people get into themselves, but out of themselves, and to move beyond their problems so they can go on to heal others.

What battles have you had in getting churches to work with New Life?

One of my great experiences was with a pastor who asked to meet with me. He told me, "I used to preach against you and against psychology. And I sure preached against anybody taking medication. Then I ended up with a depression so debilitating I could not get out of bed. I languished there for about a month." Finally his wife convinced him that he had to get help. The church board was going to fire him, and he went to see a Christian psychiatrist who gave him medication. And he said, "Now the thing that I used to preach against is the thing that has set me free to preach."

Something else happened in the process. He discovered that not only did medication not separate him from God, it allowed him to know God in a more real way. He'd always had a thinking problem—adult attention deficit disorder. He just couldn't focus and concentrate. But once he got on medication for the depression, it helped clear up his thinking, and he was able to study the Bible in a deeper and a richer way.

So he came and said he was sorry for all the years that he had preached against this.

Now I'll tell you the most dramatic horror story in our area, in Orange County. There was a young man, Michael Pacewitz, who was a paranoid schizophrenic released from a mental institution at the age of 16. He was on heavy medication. A local church took him in, and he did errands around the church. He even did some babysitting. It was a wonderful story of a very severely mentally ill man finding healing and acceptance in the church community.

He became a Christian about a year after going to that church. And the pastor said to him, "Michael, now that you've accepted Christ, you're a new creature, and you no longer need medication because you're a new creature in Christ." Michael stopped taking the medication.

The Orange County Register interviewed him from a jail cell after he had plunged a knife through the heart of a little girl. They interviewed the pastor, and he said, of course, "I will never, ever recommend that a person stop taking medication."

The fact is, psychology has given us tremendous insights into many human problems. Christians, of all people and for Christ's sake, should be the first to recognize and use these insights for the healing of others.

By Michael G. Maudlin.

break my leg, do I consult my pastor about it? For some reason, when it comes to emotional needs, we think the church should be able to meet them all. It can't, and it isn't supposed to. This is why the emotional-health gospel can do so much harm. People who need help are prevented from seeking it and often made to feel shame for having the problem.

Thankfully, more and more people in the Christian community are beginning to realize that some people need this extra help. If professionals and church leaders can recognize the value of each other's roles, we will make progress in helping the wounded. Forty percent of all individuals who need emotional help seek it first from the church, and some of these will need to be referred to mental-health professionals. Church leaders should get to know Christian therapists in their communities so they can knowledgeably refer people with persistent emotional problems.

DEPRESSED SAINTS

Lurking beneath the stigma that many Christians with mental and emotional problems face is a simple question:

Can a Spirit-filled Christian have emotional problems? The emotional-health gospel overlooks the record of the Bible itself and church history, just as health-and-wealth gospels must ignore the history of not-so-rich saints (not to speak of Jesus himself).

The Reformer who penned "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God," Martin Luther, in 1527 wrote: "For more than a week I was close to the gates of death and hell. I trembled in all my members. Christ was wholly lost." According to Luther's famous biographer, Roland Bainton, Luther found himself "subject to recurrent periods of exaltation and depression of spirit." Luther himself had written that "the content of the depressions was always the same, the loss of faith that God is good and that he is good to me."

The famous preacher Charles Spurgeon, who lit the fires of the nineteenth-century revival movement, struggled so severely with depression that he was forced to be absent from his pulpit for two to three months a year. In 1866 he told his congregation of his struggle: "I am the subject of depressions of spirit so fearful that I hope none of you ever get to such extremes of wretchedness as I go [through]." He explained that during these depressions, "Every mental and spiritual labor . . . had to be carried on under protest of spirit."

In the Bible we find that Moses, Elijah, Job, and Jeremiah suffered from depression, often to the point of being suicidal. Elijah's miraculous victory over the prophets of Baal in 1 Kings 18 is followed in the next chapter with Elijah despondent and trembling with fear: "And he was afraid and arose and ran for his life . . . and sat down under a juniper tree; and he requested for himself that he might die" (1 Kings 19:3-4; all verses quoted from the NASB unless otherwise noted).

I've heard Elijah here described as being a coward or accused of having a grand old pity party. Such interpretations fail to see God's compassionate response to his cry: "And the angel of the Lord came again a second time and touched him and said, 'Arise, eat, because the journey is too great for you'" (19:7). Far from criticizing him, the Lord allows him to rest and twice sends an angel to feed him.

Job cried out in the midst of his suffering, "I cannot eat for sighing; my groans pour out like water. . . . My life flies by—day after hopeless day. . . . I hate my life. . . . For God has ground me down, and taken away my family. . . . But I search in vain. I seek him here, I seek him there, and cannot find him. . . . My heart is broken. Depression haunts my days. My weary nights are filled with pain. . . . I cry to you, O God, but you don't answer me" (3:23-24; 7:6, 16; 16:7; 23:8; 30:16-17, 20, LB). Notice that even with his depression, the Bible says, "In all this Job did not sin" (1:22). Moreover, God reproves Job's friends for accusing Job of sin and for their "failure to speak rightly concerning my servant Job" (42:7-8).

So the answer to our question is a definite yes: Spirit-filled Christians can experience emotional problems.

Those who adhere to the emotional-health gospel often believe that negative emotions are in themselves sinful. We need to ask them how they account for the displays of Christ's emotions. In the Garden of Gethsemane, he "began to be very distressed and troubled. And He said to them, 'My soul is deeply grieved to the point of death'" (Mark 14:33-34). Jesus, in coming to earth, took upon himself the form of a human with all its frailties, yet he did not sin.

Paul writes with affirmation, "And I was with you in weakness and in fear and in much trembling" (1 Cor. 2:3). Later he wrote, "We were afflicted on every side; conflicts without, fears within. But God, who comforts the depressed, comforted us by the coming of Titus" (2 Cor. 7:5-6).

Consider this thought experiment. Give me the most saintly person you know. If I were to administer certain medications of the right dosage, such as amphetamine, thyroid hormone, or insulin, I could virtually guarantee that I could make this saint anxious with at least one of these agents. Would such chemically induced anxiety be explained as a spiritual sin? What if the person's own body had an abnormal amount of thyroid hormone or insulin and produced nervousness? I have seen patients in this precise predicament.

While the church should never condone willful sin, it must learn to accept that people within it may suffer from emotional symptoms that are not the result of personal unconfessed sin, as many proponents of the emotional-health gospel suggest. We must take seriously Paul's injunction to "encourage the faint-hearted, help the weak, be patient with all men" (1 Thess. 5:14).

EMOTIONAL PROBLEMS.

CALLING WOUNDS SCRATCHES

Which brings us to the heart of the problem with the emotional-health gospel. Followers of the emotional-health gospel often have a naïve understanding of the nature and cause of mental illness. Is mental illness always due to sin? Can people cure themselves by doing or thinking the right things? What role do chemicals and genetics play? What part can good, biblical counsel have in restoring people? How we answer these questions will dramatically skew how we deal with those suffering emotional problems.

It is tempting for people experiencing everyday stress and its accompanying anxiety or depression to think that those with severe emotional problems feel much the same as they do—only a little worse. After all, isn't depression merely feeling blue or down, and anxiety just plain worry or nervousness?

One minister writing on depression stated that he was "depressed" for several days after a property contract had failed. He wrote, "As a basic rule I never sympathize with depressed people. . . . These people have already pitied themselves excessively, thus generating their depression. What they need is help, which comes by gently getting them to see that they are indulging in self-pity." From the experiences of the many patients I have observed, I strongly doubt this author has experienced or understood clinical depression.

Recent studies of more than 11,000 individuals found depression to be more physically and socially disabling than arthritis, diabetes, lung disease, chronic back problems, hypertension, and gastrointestinal illnesses. The only more disabling medical problem was advanced coronary heart disease. And the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services reports that individuals who have suffered both emotional illness and cancer report that their emotional illness caused them the greater pain.

Deep depression is not just self-pity. The level of anxiety of those with generalized anxiety and panic attacks is significant even during sleep. If you can imagine the anxiety of being on a hijacked airplane and seeing several copassengers shot, you can begin to grasp the level of anxiety some people suffer for days at a time. Even people with moderate clinical depression (dysthymia) feel pain on their best days.

From a research perspective, the emerging answer to what causes emotional illness involves three components: nature (one's biological, chemical, and genetic makeup), nurture (environment, circumstances, teachings), and personal choice (which can but does not necessarily include sinful choices). Not uncommonly, the cause is a combination of all three of these.

While research into these matters is still in its infancy, some conclusions are already clear. Any paradigm that judges all mental illnesses to have the same cause (whether it be "sinful choices" or chemical imbalances) is too simplistic. We are a complicated and dynamic amalgam of body and spirit, nurture and nature. Any attempt to reduce our holism dishonors the Craftsman who made us.

Let me provide some examples of how these factors interact. More than a decade ago I experienced a severe depression caused by an external event: a patient for whom I cared very much committed suicide. For over three months a devastating sense of doom kept me feeling desperate and hopeless. I forced myself to socialize, exercise, and think on positive things. I spent additional time in the Word and in prayer. But I couldn't shake the depression until I asked for the help of a colleague. A circumstance in life (nurture) had thrown me into a tailspin I couldn't handle any more than I could a car out of control. At the height of my depression, I am sure my brain chemistry was affected. Still, God chose to preserve me through talking with a colleague, which had the effect of restoring me emotionally and, theoretically, chemically.

While my depression had been triggered by an outside circumstance, Marty's* was the result of a physical cause. A popular Big Ten athlete and a committed Christian, he encountered his first major depression the year after college. While at times he experienced tremendous highs, other times it took incredible effort for Marty to get up in the mornings, go to work, play with his young children, or go to church.

He was afraid of discussing his problem with friends because he believed it was a symptom of sin. He prayed, struggled, asked God to forgive him, and looked for what God might be teaching him. The only answers he heard from conference speakers and church leaders were prayer and confession. He wondered if demons caused his affliction.

When his problem was diagnosed as a physical one—bipolar disorder—I started him on lithium. The results produced an emotional stability that has lasted to this day—12 years so far. He is very active in his church and is involved in discipling a number of young men. But because of the stigma, only his wife and I know of his condition or that he is taking medication.

A number of studies point to a genetic origin of bipolar disorder. They show that while close relatives and the second fraternal twin have a 15 percent probability of acquiring the disease, the second identical twin has a 75 percent chance of acquiring it.

While Marty's illness had an internal cause, it resulted in external behaviors. The same is true for the cure. Does the physical cause of his illness mean that he was not responsible for his behaviors? No. We all have to stand before God for what we have done. Yet independent of what one does, we know that a person with a bipolar disorder is helped by chemical therapy.

Pat* provides an example of the inadequacy of a rigid physical/spiritual distinction and of the interplay between nature, nurture, and personal choice. A vivacious 23-year-old secretary, she had been extremely healthy until her car blew a tire on a busy but unfamiliar Los Angeles street. When she noticed the graffiti on the walls and people of another ethnic group who seemed to be watching her every move, she grew frightened. Subsequently, whenever she drove more than a few miles from home, dreadful panic attacks ensued. She feared, she said, she would "go Loony Tunes" or die. These attacks soon began to control her life, even when she was in "places that were perfectly safe." She also began to withdraw socially.

Her agoraphobia, as this kind of fear is called, had occurred in her family before. Her maternal grandmother and an aunt had experienced panic attacks, and her mother was afraid to ride elevators. As Pat sat in my office for her first appointment, she asked, "What is the cause of these attacks—physical or mental?"

"The answer is both," I told her, explaining that these factors cannot easily be separated. Studies show that 7 percent of the population develop panic attacks (with or without agoraphobia) during their lifetime, and 25 percent among those with close relatives with the problem. Which raises the question: Does agoraphobia run in families because of genes or environment?

In 1946, it was observed that patients with panic attacks often have an intolerance to heavy exercising. Researchers found that during exercise the body normally produces the chemical sodium lactate, but at higher levels in those who suffered from panic disorders. In 1967, Ferris Pitts injected sodium lactate intravenously into individuals prone to panic and found that the injection usually brought on attacks similar to the patient's worst attacks. The fact that individuals not subject to panic disorders in the first place did not develop attacks when given the sodium lactate pointed to a chemical difference in the individuals who experienced the panic attacks.

A later study showed that if patients with panic attacks were given certain medications, such as an antidepressant or a benzodiazepine tranquilizer, they greatly decreased or prevented panic attacks from developing when the sodium lactate was later injected. These are the medications we now use to help individuals such as Pat.

Interestingly, doctors also discovered that telling their patients to relax in order to relieve their anxiety usually did not work. In fact, for six out of ten patients, trying to relax actually brought on a panic attack.

With this medical evidence, it is obvious that we cannot attribute such panic attacks to wrong thinking or choice alone; there are clear underlying biological and chemical factors. The latest research shows that in anxiety disorders, the nerve endings overfire and excite the brain with chemicals called catecholamines. Medications we use to treat anxiety help reduce this overfiring to a normal level.

So what caused Pat's panic disorder? Her history suggests a very strong genetic-biological vulnerability to develop panic attacks. The fact that her grandmother and mother often communicated their fears to Pat while she was growing up points to a developmental influence, as does her learned fear of neighborhoods painted with graffiti and populated with people of a different ethnicity than her own. The threatening experience of being stuck on that unfamiliar street provided the environmental trigger that precipitated her first attack.

Besides nature and nurture, a third part of the equation—personal choice—must be factored in to understand her attacks fully. Her later avoidance behaviors (such as not driving far from home) decreased Pat's panic attacks for a time, but they also allowed her fear to fester and grow. Even after we talked about how avoidance can make panic worse, and I had encouraged her to take steps to counteract it, she had a hard time following through on the assignments. She also continued to feed her fears with the notion that she was going crazy. Such "catastrophizing" often leads to a debilitating fear of having panic attacks. Since agoraphobia increasingly incapacitated her, I recommended some medications that often help. To date she has refused them—another choice.

So are Pat's problems caused by sin? If her pastor tells her simply to trust in the Lord, to pray more, and to meditate more on Scripture (all of which is generally very good advice), have we really understood or helped Pat with her problems?

A NAIVE UNDERSTANDING OF THE NATURE AND CAUSE

OF MENTAL ILLNESS.

IS MENTAL ILLNESS ALWAYS

WHAT THE WOUNDED NEED

An issue of Moody magazine several years ago addressed the debate over Christian counseling. A number of writers took a strong stand against it. But Joseph M. Stowell, president of Moody Bible Institute, offered the balanced view I am arguing for. He said, in part:

There is often a need for well-trained counselors to lead the broken to healing.

Does that mean the Scripture and the Spirit are not sufficient? No. . . .

While much that is taught and practiced in secular counseling is unbiblical, it is also true that there are many helpful insights to be gleaned from this field. . . .

We live in a season when life is increasingly complex and the fragility of precious souls is demonstrated by growing brokenness and complicated conflicts. We dare not waste their sorrow on the battlefield of careless counsel that violates biblical parameters or with simplistic, unqualified solutions that plunge them ultimately into deeper despair.

What the emotionally wounded need is for the body of Christ to be a place of love, acceptance, encouragement, forgiveness, and compassion. They need a place where Christ is lifted high and God's Word is never compromised but also where there is openness to use all available methods of healing that are not contrary to his Word. This kind of environment will not only foster emotional growth, but it will make this healing effort a spiritual service pleasing to God.

The Alpha-Brits Are Coming

TIMOTHY C. MORGAN

A British course for non-Christians aims to transform North American evangelistic outreach.

When Nicky Gumbel began teaching the Alpha course in 1990, originally intended for new Christians, the Oxford educated barrister-turned-Anglican-priest soon discovered that many students were not Christians at all. They were, however, spiritually curious.

After mulling over how to meet their needs, Gumbel and leaders from his parish, Holy Trinity Brompton, where the Alpha course began in 1977, restructured and reworked the course curriculum so that non-Christians would be able to understand the basics of Christianity.

The revised course, as spelled out in Gumbel's book Questions of Life, does not begin with well-known theological categories and issues of doctrine. Its starting point is instead the experience of many nonbelievers that Christianity seems "boring, untrue, and irrelevant."

The impact on attendance was explosive. "Every talk is aimed at somebody who is outside the church," Gumbel says. "When we did that, we found that the numbers just rocketed." Holy Trinity's most recently concluded Alpha course drew 1,200 people, one of the largest groups ever, for the course's celebration dinner, an event that functions both as course climax and kickoff for the next round of instruction.

Alpha's full impact is no longer focused solely at Holy Trinity Brompton, a Church of England parish that is one of the most influential evangelical and charismatic congregations in Europe. Starting in 1993, Gumbel and Holy Trinity leaders released Alpha materials to churches throughout the United Kingdom first, and then to the rest of Europe, North America, and worldwide.

Global growth rates for the number of Alpha courses and attendees initially stunned Gumbel. "It was an amazement to us that it would work in any other church outside our own," he says. In 1991, four Alpha courses drew 600 people. In 1997, an estimated 500,000 attended courses around the world. Gumbel and Alistair Hanna, a former corporate consultant and now head of Alpha North America, believe that by the year 2001 some 50,000 Alpha courses could be held yearly in the United States and Canada.

"I like to say that the biggest denomination in America is the unchurched," Hanna says. "There are 86 million of them. We don't need to poach from each other. We can actually go out and find people who don't go to church at all." Hanna envisions an Alpha course for every 5,000 residents of North America. But he says, "We won't be as good as McDonald's and say we've got an Alpha course within four minutes of you." An infectious enthusiasm, entrepreneurial spirit, and a bold plan for growth are all trademarks among Alpha's top leaders.

But not everyone is cheering Alpha onward. Some church leaders have found Alpha teachings too charismatic, too experience-driven, and too negative about traditional churches. Martyn Percy, director of the Lincoln Theological Institute for the Study of Religion and Society of the University of Sheffield, England, has commented about Alpha that it is "a package rather than a pilgrimage." In a recent essay, he said, "It is a confident but narrow expression of Christianity, which stresses the personal experience of the Spirit over the Spirit in the church."

The ten-week Alpha course bears some theological similarity to the bestsellers Mere Christianity, by C. S. Lewis, and Basic Christianity, by John Stott. But Alpha is significantly different, and it is its distinctives that have drawn criticism. For example, there is a strong emphasis on class attendees inviting the Holy Spirit to fill them. Gumbel says individuals are not required to speak in tongues, but it is very common for Alpha attendees to do so.

CHURCH-BASED EVANGELISM: Since Alpha is designed to be run in local churches, the program makes extensive use of promotional endorsements from prominent church leaders as well as emotional testimonials on how Alpha has transformed lives.

The Alpha program calls for congregations to rethink their approach to evangelism. Instead of offering church-based community events or services that might expose nonbelievers to a congregation, Alpha instructs leaders on how to use an invite-your-friends model to stimulate interest in Christian doctrine.

"We don't try to get people who are not interested," Gumbel says. "The reason they have an interest is not because they have an interest suddenly in Christianity, but because of what happened to their friend on the previous course."

The Alpha system at first blush seems overly simplistic. The acronym stands for: A—Anyone interested in finding out more about the Christian faith; L—Learning and Laughter; P—Pasta (eating together gives people the chance to know each other); H—Helping one another (small groups are used for discussion of issues raised during the lectures); A—Ask anything. No question is seen as too simple or too hostile.

However, Alpha, in the hands of skilled church leaders, has succeeded in many cases in turning faithful churchgoers from an inward focus on church work to an outward focus on evangelistic outreach through relationships, networking, and invitations to Alpha events. In Gumbel's words, Alpha stimulates a "virtuous circle" that spreads outward, allowing churches regularly to break into new networks of unchurched, unevangelized people.

During the past six months, Alpha North America has held leadership-training conferences in Vancouver, British Columbia; and Overland Park, Kansas; among other places. In 1998, similar two-day events are scheduled at other venues around the United States. (Information is available from 1-888-949-2574).

Many people first experience the Alpha course as a series of videotapes featuring the telegenic Gumbel. But for a good half of the 450 people who attended an Alpha leaders conference in the suburbs of Kansas City in January, their first glimpse of the self-effacing, humorous speaker was in person.

ways the conference resembled Alpha's signature Holy Spirit weekend, featuring contemporary worship music; back-to-back talks by "the two Nickys"—Gumbel and his lifelong friend, Nicky Lee, also an Anglican priest; dramatic testimonies by Alpha converts; and charismatic prayer sessions during which some people speak in tongues or fall prostrate on a carpeted floor.

Maj. Ron Gorton of the Salvation Army in Kansas City, Kansas, says he became acquainted with Alpha because Salvationists in England have operated courses.

Gorton says he and other Salvationists are discussing whether the Alpha course will meet their needs as they make changes in the Army's substance-abuse recovery program. "The things that God is teaching through this course are very similar to what he has been teaching us foothold internationally among Roman Catholics, Baptists, and other faith groups.

One of the most expensive neighborhoods in Canada is the west side of Vancouver, British Columbia. Vancouver itself is one of the most secular cities in North America, and church growth, when it happens, is slow.

But Sally Start, a member of Vancouver's Dunbar Heights Baptist Church, began inviting a handful of her neighbors to join her in watching the Alpha videos a couple of years ago. Two of those neighbors have since joined the church and are now helping her run Alpha, which has since moved into the church with the leadership's blessing. About 20 new people have expressed interest in taking the next Alpha course. That is a hefty proportion for a church of only 50 people.

One of Dunbar Heights' newer members is 43-year-old Don Macdonald, an accountant who, barely a year ago, was a self-described atheist. His wife had been a long-time member of the church.

"Sally challenged me" to take the course, he says. By the time he finished, "I just couldn't believe there wasn't a God." From there, salvation through Christ resulted. "My heart finally convinced me."

"Our experience has been that none of [the participants], by the time they finish the course, are able to say anything other than Christianity is true," says Start. Not all of them make Christian commitments within the course, and of those who do, not all stay at Dunbar Heights. Some find that church too conservative and go elsewhere. "We're making a difference from a kingdom perspective, and that's what we keep focusing on," Start says.

Alpha's openness to questions allows people to experience learning about the Christian faith in a way that is not threatening.

Some have had "toxic" religious experiences in the past, says Start. They need to be able to say what they think and be accepted for who they are. Others have a "refreshing naiveté" about the Christian faith. They do not carry the same "inhibitions" as people who have been raised in the church.

One of the young women helping to lead the Alpha course was having trouble conceiving. A bout with cancer and surgery made it less likely that she would become pregnant. The Alpha group prayed for her, and just before Christmas she gave birth to a baby boy. Start says, "I'm not sure if outside Alpha we would have prayed."

conscious effort to touch both minds and hearts with the gospel. Each plenary session included testimonies from people who became Christians or had their faith deepened through involvement with Alpha.

Keith Prestridge of Overland Park gave a brief talk on the first evening, striding toward the platform in a black leather jacket. Prestridge talked about leading a "punk rock, acid jazz" band known as the Screaming Beagles. Prestridge followed the ultraviolent philosophy of a character in Anthony Burgess's novel A Clockwork Orange until he dropped in one morning during worship at a Vineyard Fellowship service. Prestridge offered a pugilist's description of Alpha's Holy Spirit weekend: "They laid hands on me, and I knew release, you know? I know those of you who have felt the Spirit know what it's like. It's like being in a good fight and suddenly being knocked out."

The Kansas Alpha conference attracted a cross-denominational group, including seven members of the Salvation Army.

through our drug-and-alcohol program," Gorton says. "God has taught us that we need to break down this barrier of 'us and you.'"

Most testimonies at the Alpha conference focused on experiences at its Holy Spirit weekends. Hairdresser Mark Walker of Rogersville, Missouri, spoke about being delivered from two decades of drug addiction.

"After 21 years of drug abuse, three rehabilitation centers, two mental institutions, and two passes through jail, I decided I needed to change my life," he says. Walker missed a few of the first Alpha sessions, but then he went on the weekend retreat. "Late in the evening I laid in the back of my pickup truck and asked God to fill me with the Holy Spirit," he says.

BAPTISTS ADJUST ALPHA: Alpha courses have been held in about 50 countries. Although many have been held in Anglican, Vineyard, or independent charismatic churches, Alpha is gaining a are cautious about Alpha's teaching on the Holy Spirit. "There seems to be more of a stress on the gift of tongues than I think is biblically warranted," says Van Horn.

"I'm a little leery of people who are not yet saved being pressed to be filled with the Spirit." Repentance is necessary before that should take place, he says. Van Horn is not bothered enough by the Holy Spirit teaching to dismiss Alpha altogether, however. "We have at times worked around that a little bit," he admits. Other pastors have done the same thing, despite Gumbel's emphasis on the importance of not modifying the curriculum.

In a society where faith is viewed as a private matter, Van Horn is pleased to provide a means for Christians to express what they believe. "One of my goals is to see people in the church equipped to share the gospel where they are," he says. "Not everyone is comfortable with that. Alpha gives them a practical way to fulfill their responsibility to evangelize."

EXPERIENCE OVER REASON? The Alpha approach has been faulted for pushing an experience-driven approach to evangelism that sidesteps intellectual difficulties. Yet Peter Horton, Rick Richardson, and a team from the interdenominational Church of the Resurrection in Glen Ellyn, Illinois, have found Alpha useful in reaching Generation X, young adults in their twenties and early thirties.

"Anything you do with Generation X needs to be relational," says Horton. "You have to show them that Christianity applies to things that they are struggling with and is relevant for them."

The Alpha structure is built to encourage relationships. "You bring your friends to Alpha and you start with a meal, which builds relationships," Horton says. Paula Karrasch, a recent college graduate, took part in Alpha a year ago. Karrasch says, "The meal forced me to talk to people. I couldn't hide. I had to relate to people."

The participants in the course are also divided into small groups from the beginning and attend a weekend get-together. "The purpose of the small group is to build community and relationship," says Horton. "It's meant to be a place where people can be open and ask questions."

Horton stresses the importance of authenticity and relevance in relating to Generation X. "Our personal stories of our relationships with Jesus are really important in showing them who Jesus is. I'm myself, being authentic and real. I think Generation X really wants to hear my story so they can see if it really works for me."

"Rick told a lot of stories from his own life," says Karrasch. "I could see he wasn't this perfect, crystal clear Christian." They also watched a Mr. Bean video in which British comedian Rowan Atkinson falls asleep repeatedly throughout an Anglican church service. "It related to me as I didn't know what was happening in church. I could identify with Mr. Bean."

Alpha uses both apologetics and personal stories to communicate its evangelistic message. "Generally, Generation Xers are not interested in apologetics," says Horton, "but are very interested in personal stories or narrative." Horton believes that the stories bypass the "cynicism of Generation X."

Horton says, "It's not proof that they want, but experience. Typically, they're not asking me to prove that Christ died. They're more interested in what impact Christ will have on their lives."

"One of the principles of Alpha is that evangelism involves the whole person, the head, the heart, and the will," says Horton. Accordingly, the Alpha course allows participants to encounter God in many different ways. "It's an opportunity for them to explore Christianity and see whether it can address their needs."

QUESTIONS OF GUMBEL: More church leaders and scholars have questioned the Alpha program as it has gained a higher profile, and many of the criticisms have been focused on Alpha audio- and video-cassettes. Gumbel says the definitive Alpha curriculum is his book Questions of Life, and all ten Alpha teachings have been further revised and revideotaped.

Nevertheless, a lengthy critique of Questions of Life has been published in the January 1998 Episcopal Evangelical Journal. In his review, Roger Steer, a British author, faults Gumbel for downplaying the sacrificial nature of Christian living, for selectively quoting Scripture, and for portraying established churches as "dreary and uninspiring."

Steer in part focuses on Gumbel's selective scriptural quotation concerning speaking in tongues. In 1 Corinthians 14:5, Paul says, "I would like everyone of you to speak in tongues, but I would rather have you prophesy" (NIV). However, in Questions of Life, Gumbel says, "Not every Christian speaks in tongues. Yet Paul says, 'I would like everyone of you to speak in tongues,' suggesting that it is not only for a special class of Christians. It is open to all Christians. . . . If you would like to receive it, there is no reason why you should not." Steer asserts that Gumbel is wrongly suggesting that it is normative for speaking in tongues to accompany infilling of the Holy Spirit.

During a lengthy interview, Gumbel discussed Alpha criticism, saying, "We haven't got everything perfect. Alpha is alive. It's not fixed. That's why we revideoed [the Alpha lectures], because we were trying to respond to criticisms." He says when there is another printing of Questions of Life he usually makes editorial changes, based on suggestions from church leaders.

Gumbel says Alpha materials avoid using the word charismatic because "we don't regard it as charismatic; it's just what we see as Trinitarian." Some leaders believe Alpha has too much about speaking in tongues, Gumbel says, while others say there is not enough. But Alpha's aim, he says, is to hold together the theological streams represented by its teaching on the sacraments, justification by faith, and infilling of the Holy Spirit.

Because Alpha's home base has been in the United Kingdom, church leaders there have the most experience with the course program. And to date, their enthusiasm is not flagging.

For 1998, they plan the unprecedented initiative of inviting every unchurched person in the United Kingdom to an Alpha course in October. Gumbel says, "There is an Alpha course within striking distance of everyone in the U.K. and within walking distance of most." The effort has the potential to transform many of the nation's churches into hot-houses for evangelistic outreach. "That's the vision," Gumbel says. "We hardly dare even mention it. We're trying to keep our heads down. The higher the profile the more people are out there trying to knock it."

Meanwhile, Alpha North America's Alistair Hanna is searching for 5,000 church leaders to attend one of the ten training conferences this year. He says Alpha is not a "magic bullet."

"It's a lot of work," Hanna says. "It takes sustained effort and faith. One of the things that quite often happens is after you've worked your way through your church, the next [Alpha] could be very small." Hanna says one pastor had only seven people show up for his third Alpha course. "He realized that this wasn't going to do anything for anybody if he didn't get people out, having friends bringing friends."

THE FUTURE OF EVANGELICAL THEOLOGY

Roger Olson argues that a division between traditionalists and reformists threatens to end our theological consensus.

Responses by Clark H. Pinnock, Thomas C. Oden, and Timothy George

ROGER E. OLSON

Is there really such a thing as evangelicalism?" I had heard the question posed too many times. This time I heard myself responding, "There had better be! That's my family!" My passionate response surprised both me and my conversation partner.

Evangelical is not just a label for many of us. It is an emotive word that evokes powerful memories and deep-seated feelings of sawdust floors in open-sided tent meetings, moments with God and his people around altars and bonfires, sanctuaries and classrooms with preachers and teachers steeped in Scripture and soaked in the Spirit, and participation in Billy Graham crusades, Youth for Christ, Campus Crusade for Christ, and InterVarsity Christian Fellowship. This is our story. This is our song. This is our family.

But does it exist? Do I really have such a family, or is it merely a figment of my imagination—like the idealized TV families of 1950s sitcoms? And even if evangelicalism does exist, does it have a future?

I believe that evangelicalism does indeed exist, though what holds it together is sometimes hard to discern (much like the work of the Holy Spirit who animates the movement). I want to argue that evangelicalism is primarily a theological movement that has the following four minimum characteristics:

- It looks to the Bible as the supreme norm of truth for Christian belief and practice—the biblical message enshrined in its narratives and its interpretations of those narratives;
- It holds a supernatural world-view that is centered in a transcendent, personal God who interacts with, and intervenes in, creation;

- It focuses on the forgiving and transforming grace of God through Jesus Christ in the experience called conversion as the center of authentic Christian experience;

- And it believes that the primary task of Christian theology is to serve the church's mission of bringing God's grace to the whole world through proclamation and service.

These four characteristics form the evangelical theological consensus, the core of authentic evangelical theology. Others would add features to this basic list, but no self-identified evangelical theologian—conservative or progressive—would take from it.

While I believe this familial consensus exists, I am anxious about its future. Since at least the mid-1970s, this glue has been gradually losing its binding power. Debates over the exact nature of Scripture's authority, the origins of humanity and creation itself, appropriate roles of men and women in church and society, and divine sovereignty in nature and history have manifested rather than caused a growing rift between evangelical theologians. The various positions in these evangelical debates do not themselves call into question our core commitments, but the rhetoric of the debates often imply that they do.

Powerful leaders within evangelical theological professional societies have threatened to leave and create rival societies unless other evangelical theologians and scholars are expelled. Books and articles decrying either too much revision and innovation or too little vitality and fresh rethinking of evangelical thought have poured forth from evangelical publishing houses in recent years. The compilation The Coming Evangelical Crisis (Moody Press, 1996) and Millard Erickson's The Evangelical Left (Baker, 1997) warn of creeping liberalism in the camp while Stanley Grenz's Revisoning Evangelical Theology (InterVarsity, 1993) and William J. Abraham's The Coming Great Revival: Recovering the Full Evangelical Tradition (Harper & Row, 1984) call for reconsideration of traditional evangelical ways of thinking about matters dear to evangelical hearts and minds.

This crisis has been building for at least two decades, and whatever the next century holds for evangelical theology depends to a great extent on how it is handled and resolved. Failure to resolve it may mean the dissolution of the shaky unity that has marked evangelical theology since its emergence as a distinct movement during this century. My hope, however, is that the successful resolution of this debate may energize evangelical theology and be a catalyst for greater creativity and influence in the twenty-first century.

TWO-PARTY SYSTEM

At the risk of gross oversimplification, I will delineate two emerging parties, or loose coalitions, within North American evangelical theology. One party may be described as traditionalist and the other as reformist. Their differences lie in divergent mindsets toward a variety of fundamental issues, including theological boundaries, the nature of doctrine, progress in theology, and relating to nonevangelical theologies and culture in general. I would like to emphasize, however, that both groups passionately embrace the basic evangelical paradigm and work out of it.

Labels all too often are perceived as libels. Jaroslav Pelikan has defined traditionalism as "the dead faith of the living" and contrasted it with tradition as the "living faith of the dead." I do not use the label traditionalist in any negative sense. It simply means a mindset that values traditional interpretations and formulations as binding and normative and looks with suspicion upon doctrinal revisions and new proposals arising out of theological reflection.

Similarly, reformist is a label sometimes associated with idealism and progressive social and political agendas and activism. Here it simply describes a mindset that values the continuing process of constructive theology seeking new light breaking forth from God's Word. Neither label is used pejoratively.

My goal in describing these two mindsets is for evangelical traditionalists and evangelical reformists to begin to dialogue with each other for the greater good of the entire evangelical community. I believe they need to understand better one another's strengths, learn to challenge each other in love, and to work together for the strength and vitality of future evangelical fellowship and witness.

THEOLOGICAL BOUNDARIES

Church as bounded set. Traditionalists tend to specify who is "in" and who is "out" of the community. They see evangelicalism as a "bounded set" category. The only way to avoid the slide into debilitating relativism and pluralism—a disease that has virtually destroyed "mainline" Christian denominations—is to recognize firm boundaries. It must be possible to decide, by paying close attention, which theologians and movements are within the circle or—to use a common evangelical metaphor—under the tent.

One way of achieving the traditionalists' goal is to look to the past and acknowledge some outstanding signposts and landmarks in the history of Christian theology as irreversible and unquestionable achievements in interpreting Scripture.

My goal is for evangelical traditionalists and evangelical reformists to begin to dialogue with each other for the greater good of the entire evangelical community.

Traditionalists enshrine certain works of the past in a way analogous to landmark court precedents.

Evangelical traditionalism has a decidedly confessionalist cast, the acceptance of certain historical doctrinal confessions as absolute boundaries that put flesh on the skeleton of the basic evangelical paradigm. What good is it to affirm Scripture as supreme source and norm for faith and practice if one can draw all the wrong conclusions from it? Even cultists often affirm the supremacy of Scripture and claim to be "born again."

For at least the last 15 years, various evangelical thinkers have warned against "the goddess of novelty" and spurious innovation in theology, calling evangelicals back to the sources of the faith. Thomas C. Oden of Drew University, who represents a moderate and irenic traditionalism within the Arminian wing of evangelicalism, argues for a new appreciation of the early church fathers and the Great Tradition of Christian thought that preceded the denominationalism of Christianity. Oden likes to quote the criterion of Christian truth suggested by early theologian Vincent of Lérins: "What has always been believed by all Christians everywhere." Oden believes that the Great Tradition should be held up as a norm for Christian thought without denying the need for occasional, moderate reformulation of that tradition.

Other evangelical traditionalists emphasize the magisterial Reformation of the sixteenth century—Luther, Calvin, and the great Protestant confessions of faith stemming from their reforming theologies—as the touchstone of doctrinal truth for authentic evangelicalism. Certain evangelical thinkers have come together as the Alliance of Confessing Evangelicals (ACE) to call evangelicals back to our roots in the magisterial Reformation. Some within this group and its sympathizers look to Gordon-Conwell Seminary professor David Wells as the prophetic voice crying in the wilderness of current evangelical enthusiasm for therapeutic preaching and market-driven ecclesiology. Wells's books No Place for Truth (Eerdmans, 1993) and God in the Wasteland (Eerdmans, 1994) are regarded by them as clarion calls back to the solid ground of tradition and away from the precipice of evangelical decline into cultural accommodation.

Whether they sympathize with Oden's focus on the early church or Wells's emphasis on the magisterial Reformation and Puritan theology, all evangelical traditionalists see the need for firm confessional boundaries around the evangelical community. It is not enough to proclaim "The Bible only!" and leave open its interpretation to anything and everything that can possibly be justified by appeal to it. That would be like declaring allegiance to the Constitution while rejecting landmark Supreme Court decisions or even the authority of the Court itself.

Church as centered set. Reformist evangelicals, on the other hand, prefer to see evangelical Christianity as a centered-set category rather than a bounded-set one. Risking ambiguity about boundaries—who is “in” and who is “out”—they insist on keeping the boundaries open and relatively undefined. Thinkers, books, groups can be “more or less” evangelical. When it becomes necessary—as sometimes is the case—to decide whether a particular theologian or movement is truly evangelical or not, reformists look to the center—the unchanging constellation of four evangelical commitments that makes up its paradigm.

To reformists, the traditionalists’ emphasis on clear boundaries verges on obsessiveness with order and manifests an “us/them” mentality. Their questions to evangelical traditionalists would be “whose creeds and confessions?” Those who hold to the Westminster Confession of Faith cannot affirm all of Wesley’s articles of religion or Pentecostal statements of faith. To reformists, the traditionalists’ respect for past affirmations is laudable, but their tendency to treat detailed doctrinal statements—however hoary—as virtual additions to Scripture undermines not only theological progress but prophetic correction by Word and Spirit.

While resisting doctrinal relativism and pluralism, reformists wish to remain open to prophetic voices from the “fringes” that may not have been heard as authentically evangelical before. The boundaries may remain relatively open and undefined so long as the center remains strong.

Reformist evangelical thinkers look to scholars such as Clark H. Pinnock and Stanley J. Grenz as pioneers of cautious, biblically committed evangelical reformism. Pinnock’s Tracking the Maze (Harper & Row, 1990) and Flame of Love (InterVarsity Press, 1996) and Grenz’s Revisioning Evangelical Theology (InterVarsity, 1993) and Theology for the Community of God (Broadman & Holman, 1994) are models of the centered-set concept of evangelicalism. While respectful of the Great Tradition of Christian theology and especially of the Reformers’ work in the sixteenth century, they recognize the fallibility of every human tradition and the need for ongoing reformulation of human perceptions of truth. Rather than look to the past for unchangeable landmarks and confessional standards, they look to the future and seek change within continuity for the sake of continuing evangelical vitality and viability.

Prescription. For evangelical theology to have a vibrant future it needs to have flexible boundaries with a strengthened center. Reformists are right to emphasize the center as the unifying force—the church is always strongest when it is emphasizing what it affirms—but they are wrong to emphasize inclusion without right affirmation. Reformists need to include in the center a cognitive content of core beliefs that are transcultural and translinguistic.

The cognitive content of the evangelical core identity need not be the jots and tittles of a full-blown systematic theology or any particular creed, confession, or catechism, but it must use the spirit of these formulations to point to the foundational experience of being transformed by God’s spirit into Christlikeness and a confession of Jesus as God and Savior. The core of belief at the center will also include the unique inspiration of Scripture and salvation by Jesus Christ alone through God’s grace alone.

One of the tasks of theology will be to make this center so strong and attractive that many will move toward it into the “big tent” of evangelical Christianity and out of the night of heresy and doctrinal confusion. Still, it must be remembered that it is the experience of God’s transforming Spirit through encounter with Jesus Christ in conversion that best guarantees authentic Christianity—including orthodox belief.

Traditionalists need to recognize that affirmation of truth may take different forms. One is not necessarily or automatically pronouncing heresy just because the expected shibboleth comes out wrongly. G. K. Chesterton is supposed to have warned against liberal distortions of Christian truth by saying that if one wishes to draw a giraffe one can draw it many ways, but it has to have a long neck. A moment of genuine enlightenment occurred for me when I repeated this aphorism to a colleague who replied: “Unless one is viewing the giraffe from above.” Before condemning a Christian thinker for not drawing the giraffe correctly, it is worthwhile to inquire into his or her perspective. Traditionalists are right to affirm that Christianity—and especially evangelical Christianity—cannot be made compatible with any and every cognitive content. On the other hand, they need to recognize that viewpoints may give equally correct affirmations diverse forms.

The future of evangelical theology will be a “big tent” with definite but sometimes uncertain boundaries and a strong center stage. Exactly who is under the tent is not always easy to tell, but we should embrace and attempt to include those whose faces are turned toward the center and invite them to come forward. This is the positive mission of our theological leaders.

NATURE AND PROGRESS OF DOCTRINE

Another reason for this unfortunate rift is difference of understanding about the nature of, and progress in, doctrine and theology. Traditionalists stress the close identification of formulations of core doctrines with what is directly taught in Scripture and so see doctrine as lying at the center of Christianity’s enduring essence. For them, traditional theological formulations are a first-order language of revelation. God revealed doctrines.

Reformists, on the other hand, tend to emphasize the human instrumentality in articulating doctrine, seeing it as a second-order language—in other words, as a human interpretation of divine revelation. Reformists, then, see doctrinal and theological progress as discovering “new light” breaking forth from God’s Word.

Doctrine as revelation. What is it that makes Christianity identifiable across time and space and from culture to culture? For traditionalists, it is not so much experience or liturgy or forms of community but belief in a set of doctrinal affirmations that can be translated without substantial loss across cultures and languages throughout the centuries and across continents.

Because of heretical challenges to these doctrinal affirmations, the church has found it necessary at times to enshrine them in creeds, confessions of faith, and catechisms. They are the timeless truths that arise directly out of any correct reading of Scripture itself and define Christianity over against all false gospels. The affirmation that Jesus Christ is one person in two natures, for example, is since the Council of Chalcedon (A.D.

RESPONSE

CLARK H. PINNOCK

For me, theology is like a rich feast, with many dishes to enjoy and delicacies to taste.

A PILGRIM ON THE WAY

I welcome Roger Olson's article and resonate with its analysis. There are different types of theologians, and we need to respect each other's work. We are being called to strive for the dynamic equilibrium of continuity and creativity that characterizes great theology. Olson believes, as I do, that fidelity to Scripture is consonant with innovation in formulating doctrine, and that it is all right at times to challenge assumptions that underlie certain of our traditions.

DOING THEOLOGY EN ROUTE

I also hear Olson saying (as a subtext) that, since more of our theologians are traditionalists, room needs to be made for reformists who are often under suspicion. I for one hope he is right in thinking that the evangelical movement is mature enough now to welcome both traditionalists and reformists.

As a reformist myself, I approach theology in a spirit of adventure, being always curious about what I may find. For me, theology is like a rich feast, with many dishes to enjoy and delicacies to taste. It is like a centuries-old conversation that I am privileged to take part in, a conversation replete with innumerable voices to listen to. More like a pilgrim than a settler, I tread the path of discovery and do my theology en route.

I also do theology contextually, recognizing that theology will reflect the culture in which it emerges. Everything I write is not only about something but is addressed to someone. I may have been unwise in introducing too many of my discoveries in too short a time since I have fallen under a cloud of suspicion on account of it. I know perfectly well that evangelicals are leery of innovation in theology (because it reminds them of liberalism), and that they expect their theologians to defend tradition, not challenge it. I have only myself to blame for calling too many things into question too quickly.

CONFRONTING PALEO-CALVINISM

We must realize that it will not be easy for traditionalists and reformists to live together in harmony. To illustrate, a few years ago a group of us proposed a model we called the openness of God. In it we portrayed God as a loving person and relational being, open to and interacting with the world. We thought it was scripturally serious, theologically fruitful, philosophically striking, and practically on target.

Though there were some who welcomed it, it was also attacked severely. The new Southern Baptist Journal of Theology, for example, saw it as a shot in a new battle over the doctrine of God. And the popular Reformed theologian R. C. Sproul warned that it was "an assault not merely on Calvinism, or even on classical theism, but on Christianity itself" (Willing to Believe: The Controversy over Free Will, p. 143).

I also heard an audiotepe from one of Sproul's conferences where he said, in answer to a question, that he does not consider me a Christian any longer (not to say an evangelical); and that he would not have fellowship with me because I have espoused a theological model at odds with his own variety of paleo-Calvinism in which there is no room for a vision of God as fully personal and involved, relational and passionate, mutual and reciprocal. Evidently Sproul is comfortable with perfections of stability but not with perfections of change in God. He appears to be blind to the need for a better balance between transcendence and God's suffering involvement in history. He loves the Reformation but does not appreciate hearing that maybe we need an ongoing reformation.

My point is that relations between traditionalists and reformists are threatened because some of the traditionalists insist on a more specific doctrinal component in the definition of evangelical orthodoxy than Olson describes. The model of openness, for example, cannot be evangelical, they say, because it disputes the manipulative nature of the divine-human relationship held by paleo-Calvinism.

In part I understand how they feel. The early leaders of the postwar evangelical coalition were for the most part conservative Calvinists, and it was mostly understood that there would not be a swing away from that theology. But over time we have developed into much more diverse groups of people, and the hegemony of paleo-Calvinism has dissolved. It will be hard for those who think that is a good thing to live in harmony with those who think it is a major disaster.

CALLED TO MODESTY

In order for Olson's call for peaceful relations to succeed, two things have to happen. First, we must become more modest in our claims. I do not have the final answers; neither does Sproul. Theology is an unfinished task, and all of our efforts at interpretation are limited in insight. As Paul says, "We see through a glass darkly." There is more to be known about God than any of us presently knows.

Second, we need to look to the future as well as the past. Theology did not reach perfection when the Westminster Confession (or some other sectarian standard) was penned. Theology is a venture in hope for all of us; let us pray for and anticipate an ever-fuller understanding from the Spirit of God.

May God grant that we continue to grow as hearers of the Word and enlarge our vision of the truth through interaction with each other. For my part, I value the work of R. C. Sproul and wish him godspeed.

451) as much a part of authentic Christianity as the affirmation that "Jesus is Lord!"

In his widely used Christian Theology, Millard Erickson embodies this traditionalist mindset when he affirms doctrine as the "enduring essence" of Christianity. Experience is subjective and unable to provide the firm foundation for a community of faith. To be "evangelical," he argues, is to affirm certain beliefs about Scripture and God that are not open to revision or change in content. Only the forms in which they are expressed may change from culture to culture and time to time. In a recently published critique of The Evangelical Left, Erickson warns against what he sees as a growing tendency among some evangelical theologians to downplay and demote enduring, unchanging doctrinal commitments.

By defining doctrine as a first-order language of divine revelation, traditionalists naturally understand "progress" in evangelical thought as digging deeper into the historic sources and translating them for contemporary people. In other words, progress is effective spelling out of past achievements in theology.

Some traditionalists look back to an almost edenic period of theological reflection from the 1740s to the 1880s, with the works of Jonathan Edwards and Charles Hodge as its stalwart bookends, where Reformed theology clarified and solidified its basic confessional stance within the modern world, completing this constructive task of theology. The theologian's job today, then, is to carry forward the same basic methodology and guiding impulses by translating Edwards's and Hodge's doctrine of divine sovereignty, for example, within the conceptual and linguistic world of contemporary society.

Doctrine as interpretation. Evangelical reformists, on the other hand, tend to make a sharp distinction between doctrinal formulas and scriptural language itself. Theological constructions are the church's later interpretations of the stories and teachings of canonical Scripture and so are subject to judgment from Scripture and must constantly be held more lightly than the first-order language of the Bible and worship (e.g., "Jesus is Lord!").

For reformist evangelicals, the enduring essence of Christianity is a work of God in the life of the human person, variously called conversion, regeneration, or being born again. Doctrine serves the experience, not vice versa. This supernatural experience of conversion brings with it the conviction of the truth of Scripture and commitment to mission and service. Doctrines, then, are attempts to express faithfully and relevantly the implications of this experience. As authoritative as they may be, doctrines are never as central as the experience of meeting God.

A recent expression of this evangelical mindset is Grenz's Revisioning Evangelical Theology. Grenz calls for a recognition of the experience of conversion and conversional piety as the true enduring essence of evangelicalism, with doctrine as important—even essential—but secondary and revisable.

For example, says Grenz, whether one is premillennial or postmillennial or amillennial was once a major issue among evangelical Christians and divided the family into factions. But many evangelicals who once insisted on the enduring truth of premillennial doctrine as defining what is to be evangelical now recognize ambiguity in Scripture on the meaning of the millennium (Rev. 20). Some premillennialists have even shifted toward amillennialism without in any way defecting from authentic evangelical Christian theology. According to Grenz and other reformist evangelical thinkers, we must remain open to such future shifts and changes in human interpretations and formulations of the meaning of God's inspired Word. What endures through change is commitment to the center—Jesus Christ and loyalty to him through the work of the Spirit called "conversion."

Reformists see doctrinal and theological progress as discovering "new light" breaking forth from God's Word. Through earnestly going back to the beginning and reflecting anew on the meanings of original revelation in the light of contemporary problems, theology can discover new solutions that may have even seemed heretical to earlier generations steeped in philosophies and cultures alien to the biblical thought world. Reformists want to clear away what they see as the tangled underbrush of human traditions in order to solve theological puzzles and conundrums.

Even "new solutions," however, would to reformists be at best temporary settlements—open to further reconsideration and possible revision as required by the biblical message, illumination from the Holy Spirit, and contemporary culture. For reformists, theology's constructive task is always incomplete this side of the kingdom.

A recent flash point of controversy arising out of these two distinct mindsets is the debate over the so-called openness of God proposal. Pinnock and others have suggested that the God of the Bible is obscured by such traditional attributes as simplicity, impassibility, and even immutability. In The Openness of God (InterVarsity, 1994), Pinnock and four other evangelical thinkers argued for reforming the classical doctrine of God in light of a fresh reading of the biblical narratives of God's interaction with people.

Many traditionalists see this as a clear-cut case of violating established tradition—especially when the reformists go so far as to suggest that God may not already know every future free decision yet to be made by every person. The Christian theological tradition, they argue, has settled that issue in favor of God's exhaustive and certain knowledge (if not foreordination) of every event past, present, and future.

Even reformists who do not agree with Pinnock and his cohorts on this particular issue, like Stanley Grenz, support re-examining assumed doctrinal formulas from time to time. That is part of theology's task. What makes reformist theology "evangelical" is that it is firmly committed to, and guided by, Word and Spirit in this process and is not seeking merely to accommodate to cultural standards of "truth" when it adjusts a part of the doctrinal heritage of the churches.

Traditionalists like Erickson look at their reformist counterparts within the evangelical family and warn of the dangers of subjectivism, pluralism, and even theological liberalism. After all, didn't the father of modern liberal Protestant theology, Friedrich Schleiermacher, also place experience rather than doctrine at the center and redefine doctrine as merely attempts to bring religious experience to speech?

Reformists look over at their traditionalist counterparts and warn of the dangers of dead orthodoxy and theologism—confusing doctrinal correctness with being transformed by encounter with God. Reformists point to some traditionalists' strange bedfellows; even some who reject such a traditional evangelical practice as solicitation of faith (witnessing) are con-

RESPONSE

THE REAL REFORMERS ARE TRADITIONALISTS

If we are to engage in the "honest dialogue" to which Roger Olson calls us, we must ask: Is the traditionalist/reformist distinction the best way to name the conflict? Or does the deeper difference lie in inordinate accommodation to the assumptions of dying modernity over against the determination to grasp the opportunity of grace amid a dying culture? I think the latter is a more penetrating distinction.

THE WRONG TYPOLOGY

Olson's attempt at typological fairness actually has deep affinities with what he calls reformism. This is a somewhat tendentious typology that conservative evangelicals will find only partially illuminating but probably not perennially useful. For instance, Olson typifies traditionalism as having the view that "God has revealed doctrines." Classic Christian teaching is not best defined as unchangeable language or fixed propositions but as the living tradition of apostolic teaching that is always the same even as it penetrates various new cultural assumptions and languages. What is revealed in the Son is the Father's own merciful heart, not doctrines about mercy. Our vulnerable thoughts, language, and doctrinal reflections are always finally accountable to that revelation.

No evangelical could feel accurately described by the caricature of a "traditionalism" that views "historical doctrinal confessions as absolute boundaries," for the only absolute boundary to which evangelical confession can appeal is the apostolic testimony concerning God's own coming in the Incarnation, Cross, and Resurrection as a midrash upon Hebrew scriptures. The ecumenical councils play a role only insofar as they help identify long-agreed-upon, consensually received boundaries against false interpretations of Scripture. Since Mar-cion it has been impossible for Christians to ignore the Hebrew Bible. Since Arius it has been impossible for Christians to say that the Son of God is not co-eternal with the Father, according to Scripture. These are landmarks that remain for Christians of all subsequent times and places, since once challenged they had to be met with serious exegetical debate and consensual definition of Christian truth, which is orthodoxy.

No evangelical I know elevates the "one person in two natures" formula to the same plane as the affirmation "Jesus is Lord," however true to Scripture the former may be. Nor would any patristic writer exalt the conciliar decision to parity with Scripture. Chalcedon itself constantly places its language and formulations under the sovereign judgment of Scripture. If this is doubted, please read the text!

TRADITION ENERGIZES REFORM

It is precisely the classic Christian tradition that is the best energizer of reform. Hence the polarities Olson proposes are, in my view, somewhat deficient, although well intended. Pitting tradition against reform is not sufficiently dialectical.

Tradition enables reform. Reformists often imagine that they can improve on the apostolic teaching. Evangelical reform does not come by removing the landmarks but by observing them anew in the present situation. Indeed, new light is always breaking forth from God's Word.

But this does not mean that the original apostolic testimony is itself incomplete or subject to being amended and corrected by the new light that the gospel is always newly refracting. The revelation of God the Father through the Son, finished on the cross and validated in the resurrection, does not stand in desperate need of further modern insight to make it sufficient for our justification. The

A HYPER-AMERICAN TILT

There is indeed in the whole history of orthodoxy a contest between reformist and traditionalist tendencies (or, I would prefer to say, accommodative versus resistant tendencies), but Olson seems interested almost exclusively in its most recent history and its immediate future. This gives his description a hyper-American tilt that seems dated and biased from the viewpoint of the Two-Thirds World of evangelical Christians.

Olson is right about the centrality of the Holy Spirit in the recovery of evangelical theology, but he seems less interested in beholding the history of the Holy Spirit as the ground for assessing and grasping the present activity of the Spirit.

The bigger tent to which Olson does not refer is the communion of saints of all times and places, praising God in all languages and symbol systems. The Holy Spirit speaks all languages, as Augustine quipped. The tent of the consensus fidelium is vast and multicultural but not lacking boundaries. It is not very well understood by using Euro-American categories only.

The risk of dialogue with faithful Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholics is of a very different order than with waning theological liberals. The Evangelical-Catholic and Evangelical-Orthodox dialogues are a necessity and a requirement for our times. The liberal dialogue is largely a dated temptation and backward-looking accommodation to a dying modernity. The death of modernity is an opportunity to proclaim the truth of the gospel.

A PIETISTIC BIAS

Olson shows a decidedly pietistic bias when he defines the enduring essence of Christianity not as God's grace in Jesus Christ through the Holy Spirit, but as the human experience of conversion. And a lingering pietism surfaces in his annoyance with "theological correctness." His polarities may also have the unintended consequence of tending to keep the evangelical theological dialogue trapped in the Protestant scholastic versus pietistic quarrel between doctrine and experience.

Evangelical teaching worthy of the gospel will frame both salvific experience and sacred doctrine as derivative from revelation, from God's own merciful presence in history. Revelation is not first thought then experienced but first occurs in history, and only then thought and experienced.

BACKWARD-LOOKING REFORMERS

As a newcomer to evangelical theology, I am humbled to find Olson viewing my efforts as hopeful for the future of what he calls an irenic traditionalism, and pleased to be counted along with Stan Grenz as reaching across the evangelical divide that Olson so deplors.

Although I am viewed by some as a traditionalist, I feel more at home with his definition of reform as "a mindset that values the continuing process of constructive theology seeking new light breaking forth from God's Word," provided God's Word itself is the judge and constant reference for the new light. There is no need to be afraid of constructive theological reasoning if it is solidly grounded in the Word of God as the norm of truth for Christian belief and practice.

I have no anxiety about the theological projects of Grenz and Pinnock as long as they remain centered in the apostolic testimony and not fixated upon modern accommodation. That is their intention, as I see it. Yet Olson may stretch their intention when he says of Grenz and Pinnock that "rather than look to the past for unchangeable landmarks and confessional standards they look to the future and seek change within continuity" (italics added). Both, as I see it, look to the Scriptures earnestly and, to some degree, though less sufficiently, to the history of exegesis. But I find neither of them simply or compulsively looking "to the future" as if away from the past.

BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY TO NOVELTY

If "reformists" insist on keeping the boundaries of heresy open, however, then they must be resisted with charity. The fantasy that God is ignorant of the future is a heresy that must be rejected on scriptural grounds ("I make known the end from the beginning, from ancient times, what is still to come"; Isa. 46:10a; cf. Job 28; Ps. 90; Rom. 8:29; Eph. 1), as it has been in the history of exegesis of relevant passages. This issue was thoroughly discussed by patristic exegetes as early as Origen's Against Celsus. Keeping the boundaries of faith undefined is a demonic temptation that evangelicals within the mainline have learned all too well and have been burned by all too painfully.

Whatever values may result from supposed reformists and revisionists, they cannot function long or intergenerationally without the boundaries set long ago in relation to the challenges of Marcionism, Arianism, and Pelagianism. It would be folly to try to reform those boundaries that have been celebrated for two millennia and repeatedly confirmed by the Reformers and revivalists themselves! Although I concede that there are other tasks more important than the exposure of heresy, I warn: If there is no immune system to resist heresy, there will soon be nothing but the teeming infestation of heresy. I speak as one who was once a lover of heresy.

The Babylonian captivity to novelty is the temptation of all modern reflection. It is invading evangelical leadership at an alarming rate in ways disturbing to evangelicals in the mainline who have suffered from its bewitchments for two centuries.

NECESSARY POLEMICS

Olson is more concerned than I would be about deepening conflicts among evangelicals. I do not regard polemics as a bad word. The tension Olson describes is intrinsic to the gospel. It is the perennial tension between memory and imagination, tradition and renewal, gift and task. Hence the tension is not something to be averted or circumvented but faced candidly. Could it be that one of the strengths and gifts given to North American evangelicalism by the Holy Spirit is the freedom to confront, challenge, argue, debate according to conscience under the Word?

I am less afraid of that conflict than the lack of it. I would like to see more astute, well-informed, sharper polemical efforts among young evangelicals. A theology that serves the grace of repentance needs to nurture good, tough, honest polemics, but good means charitable and accurate, and tough does not mean irascible.

I see little evidence of a fundamental split in the Evangelical Theological Society. There indeed remains a great gulf between the ETS and the Wesleyan Theological Society, which needs to be overcome with much patience and empathy.

I find myself in deep sympathy with Wells, Packer, Horton, Sproul, and others who call for deeper grounding within the Reformation faith and landmark documents, yet not without recognition that Luther and Calvin were themselves formed by patristic exegesis of Scripture passages that enabled them better to challenge certain distorted forms of medieval scholasticism. I regard these bold evangelicals as reformers of evangelicalism, not merely backward-looking traditionalists bound to unchanging or absolute formulations that do not allow for contextualization of the gospel within the collapse of modernity.

FOLLOWING THE SPIRIT

Evangelical theology today is being reformed by the Spirit so as to listen to the history of the Holy Spirit. My wish within evangelical theology is to bring evangelicals to an awareness of how powerfully God has acted in the centuries between Paul and Luther to enable belief and confession and community in Christ.

I do not wish to look only to the past, as Olson defines the fixed habit of traditionalists, but to look to the work of the Spirit in the present and the future as illumined by the history of the mission of God the Father through the Son by the power of the Spirit in the whole church. Without an awareness of how God the Spirit works in history, however, we cannot rightly behold the work of God in the present. In any case, Olson is right to call those whom he too undialectically names traditionalists and reformists to listen to one another and challenge one another in love and dialogue. CT sidered allies by some traditionalists so long as they are theologically correct and appropriately committed to the doctrines of the magisterial Reformation.

Traditionalists accuse reformists of hobnobbing with liberals and postmodernists of various kinds. Gradually, the threat of internecine warfare looms as a real and very serious danger as these two evangelical parties—marked by their own distinctive mindsets—pull apart and fall away from brotherly dialogue into harsh polemics.

Prescription. The reformist idea that doctrinal affirmation is second-order language is simply true. No doctrinal formula or theological system is identical with divine revelation itself. And yet the traditionalist idea that some doctrinal affirmations are part of the permanent and essential core of evangelical Christianity is also true. Some theological formulations are so closely tied with the church's understanding of what God has revealed that they function as being equivalent to divine revelation.

Anyone who seriously denies the trustworthiness of Scripture or the deity of Jesus Christ or the necessity of grace for salvation must be considered other than truly and authentically evangelical, even though these doctrines have been developed by humans on the basis of divine revelation rather than directly revealed. Even if they are not "revealed truths," they are "truths of revelation."

These careful distinctions between core affirmations and secondary and tertiary doctrines that mark denominational distinctives are extremely important to keep in mind. Modern debates within the church often treat disputes over secondary doctrines as if core doctrines were at stake. This skews the discussion.

On many matters, there is no one "traditional" evangelical view. Take the differing evangelical views of divine sovereignty as an example. So long as one affirms God's ultimate ability to intervene and control nature and history (core affirmation) it should not matter whether one affirms that God does or does not limit himself in order to allow for free human participation and partnership in partially determining them (secondary doctrines). It will not matter—as a test of fellowship—whether he or she believes in God's meticulous control of all events or opts for a broader understanding such that God is "in charge but not always in control."

As for the prospect of progress in doctrine, reformists' search for new light can and must be correlated with traditionalists' strong respect for formative periods of past theological creativity and the settlements that arose out of them. We must remain open to the possibility that the Spirit of God may lead contemporary, God-honoring thinkers into deeper insights into God's Word while still honoring and learning from what the same Spirit has done in the past. Neither kneejerk rejection nor glib embrace is the way forward.

ENGAGING THE REST OF THE WORLD

Finally, these two evangelical camps have different mindsets with regard to interacting with nonevangelical theologies and culture in general. Because traditionalists see their doctrinal formulations as communicating the essence of the faith, they tend to view nonevangelical theologies and belief systems as false and as objects of critical examination and exposure. For traditionalists, then, a major task of evangelical theology is the discovery and exposure of heresy.

Reformists tend to look upon nonevangelical theologies and non-Christian culture as ambiguous and flawed quests for truth. At worst, these belief systems raise appropriate questions without providing any sound answers; at best, they can stimulate fresh thinking on the part of evangelicals. Even such a clearly nonevangelical thinker as Paul Tillich, for instance, can be seen by reformists as Luther's proverbial "crooked stick" with which God can strike a "heavy blow." Reformists live by the motto that "all truth is God's truth—wherever it is found" and attempt to remain open to the contributions of any and all serious thinkers who seek honestly after truth. They emphasize dialogue, rather than polemics, as the proper approach to nonevangelical theologians and philosophers.

To many traditionalists, reformists' openness to influence from nonevangelical theological sources is a further sign of doctrinal compromise. While one can study and talk to nonevangelicals, "dialogue" implies that you are willing to modify your positions, which traditionalists are unwilling to do. To reformists, the traditionalists' mindset smacks of triumphalism, elitism, and separatism, which is the hallmark of fundamentalism. Reformists also claim that the traditionalist stance calls into question the reality of common grace—God's sustaining power and light in the whole world that may break forth anywhere at any time.

Postmodernism as the enemy. One illustration of this divergence in mindset is their radically differing responses to the new cultural condition known as postmodernity. Traditionalists focus on postmodernism's sometimes subtle but definite denial of absolute truth. To them, theology's task is to expose this new philosophy in all its forms and manifestation as antithetical to belief in truth and certainty. They argue that the heart of postmodernism is deconstructionism—the philosophy that all claims to truth are but masks for will to power. Traditionalists rightly criticize this denial of meaning and truth and call for other evangelicals to condemn it.

This traditionalist rejection of virtually everything "postmodern" is embodied in Gene Edward Veith's volume Postmodern Times (Crossway, 1994). According to Veith, while the Christian tradition affirms and is based on absolute truth, postmodernism denies absolute truth in favor of cognitive nihilism—a free-for-all, pragmatic chaos in which "truth" is merely what works and is viable within a particular context. The paradigm postmodern thinker in this evangelical estimation is philosopher Richard Rorty, a relativist who rejects any absolute truth in favor of truth defined pragmatically.

Postmodernism as dialogue partner. Reformists find postmodernity to be much broader than deconstructionism or even relativism. These, to them, are merely manifestations of postmodernity that evangelicals, of course, cannot endorse uncritically. But they see postmodernity in general as a new emphasis on holism in life and thought—a rejection of modernity's obsession with analysis and rationality as the summit of methods of discovery. They applaud postmodernism's recognition that something like faith is involved in all human thinking and see some benefits to postmodernism's discarding of the rationalistic mindset of the Enlightenment and modern secularism in favor of community-shaped perspective as a necessary ingredient in all knowledge. The paradigm postmodern thinker in this evangelical estimation is Notre Dame philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre, author of After Virtue: A Study in Moral Theory (University of Notre Dame Press, 1984, second ed.) and Whose Justice? Which Rationality? (University of Notre Dame Press, 1988).

Reformist evangelical thinkers who cautiously value and exploit some aspects and types of postmodernity are Grenz, author of A Primer on Postmodernism (Eerdmans, 1996), Fuller Seminary professor Nancy Murphy, author of Beyond Liberalism and Fundamentalism (Trinity Press, 1996), and Canadian evangelical theologians Brian Walsh and Richard Middleton, who coauthored Truth Is Stranger Than It Used to Be (InterVarsity Press, 1995). Much to the chagrin of most evangelical traditionalists, these evangelical theologians find something of value in postmodern culture and philosophy and interpret it as an ally of Christian thought insofar as it rejects the modern project of elevating autonomous human reason above revelation and faith.

Prescription. Genuine dialogue involves sharing one's commitments, not shelving them in order to achieve meaningless agreement. Evangelical theology that is strong, mature, and unified can risk dialogue with nonevangelical theologies. Merely because an evangelical thinker goes into a setting of mostly liberal theologians to engage with them in earnest discussion does not mean he or she is compromising truth. Reformists are certainly right that such dialogue can produce benefits for both and all sides. Traditionalists are right, however, to warn of the dangers of dialogue that forbids tough-minded disagreement. An element of debate will always and inevitably mark evangelical encounters with nonevangelical thinkers.

The evangelical theology of the future will not look like a mere hybrid or synthesis of present-day traditionalism and reformism, in spite of how the foregoing vision may appear. Both parties must be willing to sacrifice vested interests and move toward the other with trust and openness. Each side will be transformed in the process as extremes are sloughed off and middle ground is explored and cleared away for new settlement.

CIVIL DIVIDE OR CIVIL WAR

Some will no doubt wonder how two such diverse mindsets can both be considered "evangelical." Some in both parties wonder the same and question the authenticity of the other party's evangelical credentials. This civil divide is gradually building up to uncivil war within the household of evangelical theology, and many civilians and a few evangelical theologians are caught in the middle, unsure which side to join or even if one must take sides at all. No doubt many readers of this article see themselves as "betwixt and between"—able to side neither with the Scylla of traditionalism nor the Charybdis of reformism.

The future of evangelical theology lies in calming these troubled waters through a peaceful settlement. There are genuine signs of hope for such a rapprochement. On the traditionalist side, Oden expresses cautious approval and support for moderate reformist theology so long as it remains faithful to the basic contours of the Great Tradition of Christian thought. On the reformist side, Grenz expresses respect for the Christian heritage of thought as a source and norm for the ongoing reforming of evangelical thought in new cultural situations. Irenic traditionalism and moderate reformism can be seen as allies in the task of revitalizing and renewing evangelical theology for the twenty-first century.

To close the divide more completely, evangelical thinkers on both sides will need to reaffirm, with clarity and resolve, their strong commitments to the four major unifying themes of evangelical Christianity: Scripture as the highest authority for faith and practice, the supernatural involvement of a personal God in nature and history, the experience of conversion by God's Spirit through Jesus Christ as the gateway into authentic Christian existence, and the proper task of theology as serving the church in its mission and service. Without these four pillars clearly and unambiguously affirmed, evangelical theology has no future.

But even more is required. For evangelical theology to rise above these current challenges, it must also refocus on lost dimensions of Christian truth. The main one that I propose is the person and work of the Holy Spirit. Future evangelical theology must take its cue from the dynamic movements of God's Holy Spirit among charismatic evangelicals of all kinds around the world and begin to explore the unpredictable sovereignty of the third person of the triune God and his transforming power.

Future evangelical theology, in my view, must plumb the depths and mine the riches of the Holy Spirit's work in Scripture (beyond past inspiration and into present and future illumination) and in community (beyond fellowship and into signs and wonders of God's reign). The true transformation that awaits evangelical theology in the twenty-first century lies in following the Spirit's lead and tracing his footsteps in the multifaceted worldwide revival that is energizing Christians in Africa, Latin America, and Asia. Without in any way abandoning the authority of Scripture or the centrality of Jesus Christ, evangelical theology must find ways to open itself to the dynamism of the Spirit who makes all things new.

A Spirit-energized evangelical theology will be less obsessed with theological correctness and uniformity and more focused on spiritual transformation. Without denying past accomplishments and glories, Spirit-led theology will look for new ways to serve the church's mission by reflecting on the liberating aspects of ministry, worship, proclamation, and service.

What exactly will this look like? My guess (only a guess) is as follows. Fewer systematic theologies will flow from great evangelical intellects and more integrative and multidisciplinary works will come forth from evangelical thinkers' pens. Theological reflection will bring the Spirit's past transforming power and activity to bear on present problems of spirituality, ecology, community, wealth, and power. Fewer articles of doctrinal polemics will appear from great evangelical minds, and more prophetic tracts and monographs will be published and disseminated that promote the Spirit's work on behalf of marginalized portions of God's creation. Above all, and most noticeably, future evangelical theology will speak in new and different "tongues" as the Spirit of God gives utterance. Voices will rise and be heard speaking out of cultures and from a gender that have traditionally been largely silent within the evangelical academy.

What will evangelical theology look like in the next century? Only God knows for sure. But there is a great and glorious future for it if two things happen soon: first, the almost-warring parties of traditionalists and reformists must lay down their polemical weapons and enter into constructive dialogue toward a new, unified, and energized evangelical academy; second, evangelical theology must throw open the stained-glass windows of the academy to let the Holy Spirit blow in and across its dusty desks and volumed-lined shelves with new life and unexpected freshness. ■

A THEOLOGY TO DIE FOR

Theology that is both Christian and evangelical arises out of the wonder and terror of having been confronted with the living God. It issues in confession, thanksgiving, and praise. As Martin Luther declared: "It is not by reading, writing, or speculation that one becomes a theologian. Nay, rather, it is living, dying, and being damned that makes one a theologian."

What I find most missing in Roger Olson's analysis of evangelical theology is this note of passion. He depicts the contemporary landscape as a kind of range war between the settlers and the explorers. As in the old Zane Grey novels, of course, there is a little drama: fences to mend, turf to protect, a gunslinger on the loose, and maybe a shootout at the OK Corral. But for what? Where is the sense that anything of ultimate importance is at stake in these squabbles? Who is willing to die for a postmodern paradigm?

When Harvey Cox was a student minister in Berlin in 1962, one year after the erection of the Wall, he was able to travel back and forth between East and West because he held an American passport. He thus became a courier for pastors and Christian laypeople on both sides of that divide and was sometimes able to smuggle theological books into the East. What the people wanted most were copies of Barth's Church Dogmatics. "To carry in something by Bultmann would have been a wasted risk," Cox said. "Let the bourgeois preachers in West Germany agonize about the disappearance of the three-decker universe and existentialism. We had weightier matters to confront." This is a parable for us today. A theology more enamored with novelty than fidelity is not worth smuggling, for it will not nourish the mission of the church nor build up the people of God.

I agree with Olson that there is an inner cleavage in contemporary theology, but the basic difference is not between forward-looking "reformists" and backward-looking "traditionalists." The more important distinction is between those who see theology connected intrinsically to the life of the church, and those who see theology as an academic discipline whose basic norms and values come from the secularized academy. The question is not whether a theologian is personally pious and attends church on Sunday, nor whether one teaches in a theological seminary or a university-based divinity school. The question is: What is the spiritual foundation and ecclesial identity of one who is called to be a theologian? Theologians are not freelance scholars of religion, but trustees of the deposit of faith that they, like pastors, are charged with passing on intact to the rising generation. In the pluralistic culture of the academy, evangelicals must become subversives or else lose their souls.

The utter impossibility of Christian theology as a detached, theoretical discipline was driven home to me when I entered Harvard Divinity School in 1972. I found myself in a systematic theology class team-taught by two remarkable professors, Gordon Kaufman and the late Arthur McGill. Among other things, I was struck by how fiercely my teachers could disagree with one another in class and then go out together for a friendly cup of coffee. I learned it is possible to engage in vigorous theological argument without resorting to personal attack. Among the students, the turf was divided rather evenly between the Kaufmanians and the McGillites. Kaufman had just published God the Problem, where he insisted that the object of theology was not the "real God" who remained impenetrable and unknown but rather the "available God," an imaginative construct and symbol of religious self-consciousness.

This was heady, academic stuff, but McGill would have none of it. He insisted that the God with whom we had to do was not a God we could discuss or argue about, much less "construct" by means of our meager theological musings. He liked to quote Luther's dictum that the most important organs for a theologian are his ears! Faith comes by hearing and hearing by the Word of God. Theology possesses no independent knowledge. It lives by what it has been told. Thus the first task of theology is to listen—to listen to the Word of God revealed—incarnate in Jesus Christ, recorded indelibly in inspired Scriptures, and witnessed to through the faithful proclamation of the church. In retrospect, I can now see that McGill was deconstructing the myths of modernity and what we were just then beginning to call postmodernity, with a little help from Augustine, Anselm, Luther, and Pascal.

SHIPS PASSING IN THE NIGHT

When the history of evangelical theology in the last half of the twentieth century is written, the intellectual biographies of Clark Pinnock and Tom Oden will loom large. Like two ships passing in the night, they have crisscrossed the theological landscape with abandon. Oden, a Methodist, coming from the wasteland of liberalism, heresy, and doctrinal confusion into the embrace of paleo-orthodoxy, Pinnock from the tutelage of Francis Schaeffer and F. F. Bruce into the open future of theological innovation.

Pinnock presents himself as a wayfarer at a theological smorgasbord, a theologian of potluck. Although he does not mention it here, he was once an advocate of the "paleo-Calvinism" he now eschews. As a professor at New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary in the 1960s, he also played a key role in the early stages of the conservative resurgence in the SBC. In 1970, he published one of the best books on biblical inerrancy written in this century. I hope that he may yet return, chastened and wiser for the journey perhaps, to the recognition that some of his former thoughts are better than his latter.

I am one of those who criticized The Openness of God project as a misguided, though well-meant, effort to construct a user-friendly God for a North American elite. I still stand by that assessment. The legitimate questions posed by these scholars—how the sovereign Lord can hear and answer prayer or interact meaningfully with the world in nature and history—have been fully considered and answered by orthodox theologians from the Cappadocians through Wesley without recourse to semiprocess theism. While it is always appropriate to question received formulations in the light of the Bible, the classical Christian doctrine of God shouldn't be dismantled without weighing it far more seriously than this proposal does.

Still, I find it hard to believe that R. C. Sproul would declare Pinnock not to be a Christian—especially “no longer” a Christian! From the Reformed perspective, if he were ever truly a Christian, he is surely still one now. For those of us who believe in divine sovereignty, such discernments are better left to God. I choose to believe that either Sproul misspoke or Pinnock misheard this remark.

From my perspective, Oden's pilgrimage is more encouraging for the future of evangelical theology. Oden's vision of a theological renaissance based on a sustained engagement with historic Christian orthodoxy can help to liberate evangelicalism from its myopic self-preoccupations. Oden's burden for a return to the sources is evident in one of the most promising publishing ventures in evangelical scholarship, The Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture.

In the history of the church, theological renewal has frequently involved the recovery of a forgotten past. Spurgeon fell in love with the Puritans, Wesley drank deeply from the Fathers of the East, Luther and Calvin were Augustinians with a passion, and the Doctor of Grace himself recovered an authentic Paulinism for his own day. None of these were mere repeaters of the past. No, they looked to the past in order to find the answer to the question, “What will be?” This is also the task of faithful evangelical theology today: it anticipates and illuminates the future while remaining faithful to the scriptural pattern of divine truth.

ROBUST EVANGELICALISM

A robust evangelical theology can transcend the polarities Olson has identified if we begin with an enriched core of evangelical essentials. The four minimalist affirmations Olson offers can be read in an orthodox way, and this is doubtless how he intends them. But they could also be affirmed in good conscience by Arius, Pelagius, Socinus and, perhaps with a gloss on the word supernatural, even Bishop John Shelby Spong! Such a porous core will not support a very stable tent however far we may try to stretch it. The evangelical faith is rooted in the Trinitarian and Christological consensus of the early church and includes the Reformation doctrines of sola scriptura and justification by faith alone.

The way to evangelical unity is not to define the smallest number of doctrines possible and hold them as lightly as one can. Evangelicals are not sectarians. We belong to the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic church and are called to “a constant adhering, affirming, confessing, maintaining, and persevering” (Luther) in the faith once for all delivered to the saints.

Within this core identity, there is much room for variety and charity in our fellowship with one another. Absolute agreement in every detail of faith and life is only an eschatological possibility, as anyone who has attended a church business meeting knows. As a Reformed Baptist, I agree with much that the Alliance of Confessing Evangelicals stands for, and I welcome their call for theological consistency based on the doctrines of grace. But I also share fellowship with many other Bible-believing evangelicals, including five-point Arminians, Bible-church dispensationalists, and charismatic Pentecostals. We try to speak the truth to one another in love, neither homogenizing our differences nor minimizing our core beliefs.

Also, evangelicals have no need to fear the development of doctrine, for this is how the Holy Spirit has led the church into all truth, as Jesus promised (John 16:13). When John the Baptist sent his disciples to ask Jesus who he was, Jesus did not say, “Go back and tell John: I am God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God, begotten not made, of one substance with the Father.” But the doctrine of the Trinity in its classic expression “developed” out of the stubborn intention of the church to remain faithful to the New Testament teaching about Jesus Christ.

This is why creeds and confessions are so important in evangelical theology: they are trademarks of biblical faith through the ages. But unlike Roman Catholics, we do not hold Scripture and tradition with equal reverence. We subject all of our confessions and theologies to the Bible and hold them revisable in the light of its teaching. We need the wisdom of the Holy Spirit to discern the difference between development and deviation. Not just “anything goes” in theology! Every theology that claims to be evangelical—from Pinnock to Sproul—must be judged in the light of its faithfulness to the total witness of Scripture.

Finally, it is naïve to think that polemics can be divorced from dogmatics, for at the heart of biblical faith is the single-minded pursuit of truth, which becomes clear only in confrontation with competing loyalties and affirmations. But this is not a damper to dialogue. The apostles and early missionaries went everywhere, from the marketplace to Mars Hill, talking with everyone they met about Jesus and the Resurrection. In the sixteenth century, Calvin, Bucer, and Melancthon met with Roman Catholic theologians to discuss the great doctrines of the Reformation. We do not risk the loss of conviction when we enter into dialogue with those with whom we differ so long as our confidence is not in ourselves but in the God of the gospel who alone makes us “sufficient” for such a task.

Theology used to be called the “gay” science before that word was highjacked by gender babblers. My hope is that evangelical theology in the future will become gay again, in the good, old-fashioned sense of the word: exuberant, bright, lively, cheerful, happy, filled with joy. For only this kind of theology, born in prayer and nourished in worship, can be truly evangelical. CT

What's Wrong With Allegra?

The Company It Keeps.

Allegra and RU 486: The Connection.

Allegra is a new allergy medication that is being pushed to replace the antihistamine Seldane. What many people don't know is that the company that made Seldane and now makes Allegra has ties to the European company responsible for bringing RU 486, the abortion pill, into the United States.

In 1995, the European companies responsible for originally developing and producing RU 486, Hoechst AG and Roussel Uclaf, acquired the American pharmaceutical company, Marion Merrell Dow. The company that resulted from this merger, Hoechst Marion Roussel, produces many popular pharmaceuticals, including the antihistamine Allegra.

Profits from the sale of Allegra ultimately benefit those companies which still produce RU 486 in Europe, where it has killed over 200,000 unborn children.

The National Right to Life Educational Trust Fund has spearheaded a consumer boycott against the American subsidiaries of the European company which manufactures RU 486 in France, including Hoechst Marion Roussel, the maker of Allegra.

RU 486 Kills Unborn Children.

RU 486 takes the life of an unborn child after its tiny heart has begun to beat. It has been used up to seven weeks of pregnancy, when the baby has measurable brain waves and tiny arms and legs.

RU 486 may also pose serious health risks to the women who take it, including hemorrhage. One woman who participated in the Iowa tests of RU 486 hemorrhaged so severely she lost over one-half of her blood volume and nearly died.

We Need Your Help.

Ask your doctor if another comparably priced non-sedating antihistamine such as Claritin or Hismanal will work as well or better for you than Allegra. Where your health and safety are concerned, follow medical advice. If Claritin, Hismanal or another alternative would be right for you, you can ask to have your prescription changed.

Your participation in the consumer boycott could help pressure the European companies that have produced RU 486 to withdraw permission for its production in the U.S. as well as permanently stop its production and use in Europe.

The 'Jackie Robinson' of Evangelism

When Howard Jones broke the race barrier on Billy Graham's platform, he faced rejection from both sides.

EDWARD GILBREATH

If Billy Graham is the paragon of evangelical Christianity in America, then Howard Owen Jones is the "Jackie Robinson" of American evangelicalism. Jones has learned that there is a mixed blessing that comes with being the first African American to realize some key achievement in this nation. On the one hand, it is a high honor to overcome a barrier that has long kept blacks on an unequal footing with whites. But there is also the pain of living with the often unfriendly fallout of being a pioneer in the fragile chronicle of racial progress in America.

"It's an awareness that you're a living test, a human experiment," the evangelist explains. "It's knowing that your every word, your every action, has the potential to either make or break the hopes of your race."

Jackie Robinson knew this angst when he became the first African American to break the color barrier in major-league baseball in 1947. Martin Luther King, Jr., felt it when he led the American civil-rights movement in the sixties. And Howard Jones experienced it when, in 1957, he became the first black preacher to join evangelist Billy Graham's crusade team.

Last year marked the fortieth anniversary of Jones's important breakthrough. It did not receive the same media fanfare as the 50-year observance of Jackie Robinson's symbolic accomplishment, but in a day when racial reconciliation was not a buzzword in the Christian lexicon and when Martin Luther King had not yet reached the zenith of his national fame, Jones was going where no black man had gone before.

TO AFRICA AND HARLEM

If Howard Jones had had his way 60 years ago, he would not have been the first black preacher to hold rallies in Africa or the first African-American associate to join Graham's crusade team. "I played clarinet and alto saxophone in dance bands," he says, "and wanted to become the next big name in jazz music."

Fortunately for Africa, Graham, and the believing community, Jones's dreams of swinging with Ellington and Basie were cut short by the bigger plans of God—and the prayers of the young woman who would become his wife.

"Wanda challenged me to examine my life," says Jones. "She told me, 'I love you, but I love Christ more. You keep playing, and I'll keep praying.' That got my attention."

"She finally won me over," he says. "She helped me understand that when you give your dreams to the Lord, he'll multiply them in ways you could have never imagined."

At 22, newly graduated from Nyack College in New York (the Christian and Missionary Alliance's oldest school), Jones pastored his first congregation, Bethany Alliance Church on Harlem's Lower East Side. Not content with in-house services alone, Jones took his preaching "on location," forming Soldiers for Christ, an evangelistic outreach to teens and others in New York's inner-city neighborhoods. Along the way, Jones became acquainted with Jack Wyrzten, a noted New York bandleader-turned-minister, whose Word of Life youth radio broadcast and evangelistic rallies regularly packed venues like Carnegie Hall. It was a friendship that would prove significant later in Jones's career.

After a fruitful eight-year stint in Harlem, Jones returned to his home turf of Cleveland where he assumed pastoral duties at Smoot Memorial Alliance Church in 1952. It was during this period that the preacher came upon a small advertisement by a radio station in Liberia, West Africa, in Christian Life magazine. "The station was interested in receiving recordings of Negro spirituals produced by black churches," Jones recalls. According to the ad, the Africans loved Negro spirituals. Jones rallied his church choir and recorded some tunes. He was surprised when, a few weeks later, the radio station responded enthusiastically about the tape.

"They said, 'We want to put you on prime time with both singing and a short message,'" Jones recalls. "They told us we'd be able to reach a good portion of Africa with the program. So, naturally, we were very excited about it."

Jones and his congregants began sending tapes on a regular basis. After a few weeks they were inundated with mail from Africans who had been converted through the program. "They said it was the first time they had ever heard the voice of an American black man," he says. "From there, it mushroomed to the point where the radio ministry invited us to come to Africa to preach to the people in person."

With his church's blessing, Jones, with his wife, Wanda, embarked on a three-month evangelistic tour of Liberia, Ghana, and Nigeria, becoming the first black clergyman to hold major rallies in Africa.

"When we got over there those people went wild," recalls Jones. "They beat drums, chanted, and said, 'Praise the Lord, the big bird has brought our brother and sister from America. We've seen the white missionary, but we've never seen a black preacher from America.'"

Throughout the cities and bush countries, people turned out by the thousands, some walking as far as 40 miles to get to the meetings. "For too long," says Jones, "white evangelicals carried an ill-conceived notion that Africans would not respond to black American missionaries. We helped change that perception."

THE LETTER

"The last thing I was expecting when we returned from Africa in 1957 was a letter from Billy Graham," says Jones. "But a month after we got back, there it was."

Graham, who was then in the early weeks of his massive 68-day crusade at New York's Madison Square Garden, had had breakfast one morning with Jack Wyrzten, with whom he discussed his dilemma: The minority turnout had been dreadful, and Graham, who had pledged never to conduct another segregated crusade following the 1954 Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka ruling banning segregation in public schools, wanted to practice the social justice he had been espousing. The evangelist had already integrated his team with Akbar Abdul-Haqq, a gifted preacher from India, but he wanted to add a black team member to his lineup.

Wyrzten recommended Jones.

Jones remembers his first meeting with Graham: "Billy jumped up and grabbed me and said, 'God bless you, my friend. I've heard a lot about you and your ministry, and I want you to come be with us for a few weeks at the New York crusade.' I said, 'I don't know, Billy. I've already been away from my church for three months.' I was afraid that if I asked for any more time off they'd kick me out."

Graham persisted and even offered to send a letter to Jones's parishioners, requesting their pastor's services. It was all that was needed. In fact, Jones's congregation was delighted that their pastor was being "borrowed" by the world's most famous preacher.

"It was a tough decision," says Jones. "As a pastor you want to be there for your people. But as an evangelist I had to be open to going wherever God called me. I knew I would eventually have to make a decision for one or the other."

THE EVANGELISM EXPERIMENT

When Jackie Robinson began baseball's historic "experiment" in racial integration in America, he was well aware of the inevitable consequences from unsympathetic whites: vicious racial put-downs, death threats, hate mail, "wild pitches" aimed at his head, fellow players refusing to shake his hand. Through it all, Robinson's assignment was to turn the other cheek.

Jones faced a similar challenge once word hit the street regarding his addition to Graham's New York crew. Immediately, Graham began getting "static" from some New York clergymen, says Jones. "You should not have that Negro on your team," came the impassioned warnings. "You're going to ruin your ministry by adding minorities." "If you have him, we're going to stop supporting you."

Graham persevered. "There was never any hesitation on Billy's part," says Jones. "He had dug the trench, you might say, and he was going through. He knew it was what God was calling him to."

Graham looked to Jones for advice on boosting minority turnout at the New York crusade, and Jones gave him the hard truth. "If they're not coming to you, you have to go where they are," Jones explained to Graham. "Billy," Jones continued, "you need to go to Harlem."

White Christians warned that it was too dangerous—"Those savages up there will kill you!"—but Graham made plans to hold a rally in Harlem. "The funny thing is," says Jones today, "some of those whites who were saying 'Don't go to Harlem' were members of evangelical churches that were sending white missionaries to Africa. They weren't afraid of the blacks over there."

Using his New York contacts, Jones spearheaded a successful rally of more than 8,000 people in Harlem, followed the next week by a similar event in Brooklyn, where more than 10,000 blacks and other minorities came out to hear Graham. Jones's plan worked. The events resulted in increased black attendance at

"We stayed at the church for another year," he says. "But during that year, we prayed and fasted for a clear signal from God. And finally we felt led to accept Billy's invitation."

Some ten years later, he would need to summon that special strength again when he was attacked by critics from the other side—advocates of the Black Power movement who felt Jones was a "sell-out" or in the "hip pocket of the white man," and that Graham was too soft on the issues of race and social activism.

"I lost a lot of my black friends who thought I should leave Billy," Jones recalls. "But I knew the right thing was to stay. The people who accuse Billy of not being vocal enough against racism and other social issues have not seen what goes on behind the scenes. They do not know that man's heart."

Jones served as an associate with the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association (BGEA) for more than 35 years, until his retirement in 1994. During that time he participated in additional evangelistic campaigns to Africa and many other nations,

"Those whites who were saying, 'Don't go to Harlem,' to Africa. They weren't afraid of blacks over there."

the crusade. U.S. News & World Report estimated that by the conclusion of the New York campaign, blacks composed 20 percent of the 18,000 people who attended the crusade each evening.

Jones was happy to see God bless the crusade with an increased minority turnout, but he remembers that period as being one of the hardest times of his life. "I was overwhelmed with a sense of loneliness," he says. "The stares, the people muttering under their voices. In the crusade there were nights when it was palpable."

With his wife and kids back in Cleveland, Jones was often the only African American around during the long days prior to the evening meetings. And the evenings were not much better. "I remember sitting on the crusade platform on various occasions with empty seats next to me because some white crusade participants had decided to sit on the other side of the stage."

At other times, Jones would go down to counsel new believers during the altar calls only to see white counselors move in the other direction. One night he remembers hearing two white pastors seated behind him murmuring: "How did he get up here?" one of them asked. The other replied, "That's Graham's ew associate."

Jones sported a steely demeanor while in public, but once the mask came down. "There were nights when I went back to my hotel room and literally wept before God and told him, 'Lord, I can't take this pressure,'" he says. "I felt like telling him that it was too much. But I knew his heart and I knew the heart of the team, and God gave me the strength to endure."

A month after the New York crusade, Graham approached Jones about joining his staff full-time. "It was an honor," Jones says, "but I was torn. I returned to the church in Cleveland, but in my heart there was a restlessness that God was calling me as a full-time evangelist.

helped bring Canadian evangelist Ralph Bell on board as Graham's second black associate, and he was instrumental in launching various humanitarian initiatives on behalf of the BGEA, such as raising $80,000 for famine-stricken West Africa in 1975. Still, according to Bell, Jones's efforts to promote social activism were not always greeted with enthusiasm by the BGEA. "Like any organization, there were those who were all for it, and those who had problems with anything besides traditional outreach," Bell explains. "Howard played a strong role in showing Billy the importance of meeting physical needs as well as the spiritual."

TOWARD SPIRITUAL RENEWAL

At 76, Jones is a lanky, yet solid figure. Old recordings reveal his straightforward, though passionate preaching—he did not embrace the "whooping" style of many African-American preachers. His passion is also conveyed in his commitment to go wherever the Lord led him. These days, Jones is a father of five and grandfather of six, living in a modest, two-story home in Oberlin, Ohio.

Though retired, Jones's current concern is what he calls the "troubling" condition of the African-American church. "Too many churches today still are not delivering the goods—the whole gospel," Jones says. "And it bothers me, because I see Muslim groups coming in and taking our young men because we've been unable to show them the true power of Christ's gospel."

Jones's most recent book (coauthored with Wanda), Heritage and Hope: The Legacy and Future of the Black Family in America (Victor Books, 1992), addresses his concern over the African-American community "entrenched in cycles of despair and hopelessness."

"Some folks may be tired of hearing those depressing statistics repeated over and over," Jones says, "but it's an important reminder to me of how far we've moved away from God and how racism and oppression have left a scar on the black family. But through Christ, we have a hope of ending the cycle of these types of numbers."

In addition to his work at the BGEA, Jones served as the first president of the National Black Evangelical Association (NBEA). Recently he became the first African American named to the National Religious Broadcasters' Hall of Fame. Aaron Hamlin, president and executive director of the NBEA, calls Jones "a key figure in the maturation of the evangelical church. Reverend Jones has both encouraged the growth of black ministers and ministries and facilitated relationships between black and white organizations."

"Things have definitely improved from the days when I first joined Billy," Jones says. "But, at the same time, it's a bit disheartening to realize that many of the prejudiced attitudes that thrived back then are still very much alive in a more covert way.

"The greatest need for Christians today is a moral and spiritual awakening," he says, "but I don't think we're going to see an outpouring of the Holy Spirit like we need until the church comes to grips with its race problem, because Jesus said, 'By this shall all men know that you are my disciples—because you love one another.'"

In pursuit of that Christian ideal, Howard Jones has seen it all—both the triumph of progress and the pain of prejudice.

"But the promise of being a whole church one day is worth the pain," says Jones. "It's worth the pain." CT

Seeker Sensitive in Komi

Russian Baptists blend Orthodox culture with evangelical outreach.

Among the few Baptist churches in Syktyvkar, capital of the Komi Republic at the doorstep of Russia's frigid North, the Church of Christ the Savior is testing new ways to blend cultural tradition and Christian outreach. But not all Russians are warming up to the idea.

Standing majestically on a hilltop surrounded by the woods of Michurinski Park, the new sanctuary of Church of Christ the Savior is most certainly Syktyvkar's most beautiful structure, a striking contrast to the surrounding unadorned architecture of the Soviet era.

Further into Michurinski Park and nestled among the trees sits a four-story theological training school. The first floor is dedicated to what promises to be the most modern rehabilitation facility in the region for persons with physical handicaps. The next two floors provide space for classrooms, libraries, and study areas to equip future pastors, missionaries, and church workers to reach Komi and Siberia. And on the top floor is a dormitory that will be home for 100 seminary students.

But it's the mud, silenced construction equipment, and piles of building materials immediately surrounding these buildings that tell a story of how the church's innovative plans have run afoul of Russians' growing ambivalence toward non-Orthodox Christians.

Towering over the city of Syktyvkar:
The new Church of Christ the Savior.

UNFINISHED LANDMARK

In 1990, when Pavel Kobzar, the church's pastor, approached city officials with plans to build a modest Baptist church building, they instead offered him prime real estate in the city's central park with one condition: That the Baptists build a landmark structure that testifies to the hoped-for progress of Syktyvkar.

Church leadership boldly threw out their modest plans and launched into a building project, the dimensions of which they hadn't dared to dream before.

At the time, the mood in Russia seemed like a fantasy to believers who had lived with intense discrimination and persecution. But with perestroika in full bloom, believers experienced unimagined freedom and opportunities.

Komi factories and organizations donated massive quantities of bricks, wood, metal, oil, and other materials toward the project. Many local leaders contributing to the project were the same ones who persecuted the church during the communist era from which Russia was emerging.

Kobzar believes that the desire to offer generous support arose out of remorse over past abuses of believers. During the Soviet era, the desolate Komi Republic was one of the leading regions in Russia for prison and labor camps, exploiting believers imprisoned because of their faith. In fact, Protestantism itself came to Komi through Ukrainian Baptists sent to work in the camps here.

Throughout the complex building project Kobzar, who describes himself as "a simple man," succeeded in gaining greater support and friendship. Through these friendships, he preached the gospel and presented Bibles "Tens of thousands in the Komi region feel positive toward us because they participated," he said.

A RUSSIAN TO THE RUSSIANS?

As Kobzar meditated on the Pauline teaching of becoming like a Jew to the Jews and a Greek to the Greeks, this son of a Ukrainian Baptist pastor knew he wanted a genuinely Russian church building.

Two local architects donated their time and talents to designing a church in "architectural harmony with the soul of Russian people." Elements of traditional Russian Orthodox church style were reflected in both the exterior and interior designs.

Elements of Russian Orthodox worship were incorporated into the church services, such as the style of singing. And a respectful spirit was expressed toward God during worship and preaching services. "If you speak for God, then stand before God," Kobzar said. During the euphoric early 1990s, local leaders were excited and proud of this prominent landmark rising up so quickly in their capital. Yet politics, the economy, and the public's mood began to sour.

SUPPORT DWINDLES

Since 1995 the economy has been in a slump, and Komi business and industry cut back their contributions.

In addition, some Russian Orthodox fundamentalists pressured local political authorities to withdraw support for such a prominent Protestant church on Russian soil.

Problems between the church and local authorities intensified in 1997 when the religion restrictions law first passed in the Russian Parliament. The church's right to build on the property was challenged as was their ministry to the Invalid Society. The church won in both cases. But recently, tax authorities froze all of the church's financial accounts while they conducted an examination.

With few remaining options, Kobzar last October sent construction workers home until the problems are ironed out.

With the project 80 percent complete, construction came to a standstill after having moved quickly for six years.

Yet, local authorities now want to know, "When will you finish?" Both buildings stand solemnly, awaiting interior finish, furniture, and equipment.

In the meantime, Kobzar has refocused his congregation on the basics, strengthening the church spiritually and ministering to the needy. Also, Kobzar is redoubling his efforts to develop local volunteers and support from missionaries in Europe and America.

FAITHFUL WORSHIPERS

Dwarfed in their new sanctuary built to accommodate 1,200 worshipers, the Church of Christ the Savior's congregation of 250 steadfastly gathers for worship.

They cluster inside the two-story-high, unfinished sanctuary walls. Overhead lighting hangs from a network of ropes and wires. They worship, pray, and sing dressed in coats and winter gear. The choir stands bundled up on the platform.

But the arctic winter has not frozen their enthusiasm for carrying on their work. Kobzar's vision for their ministry extends far beyond the boundaries of Syktyvkar.

In addition to reaching this capital city's population of 230,000, they hope to train pastors, missionaries, and other church leaders to reach the 1.3 million residents of the Texas-sized Komi Republic, becoming a gateway for church planting in the vast and unreached population of Siberia.

The Syktyvkar ministry is part of the All-Russian Union of Baptists and enjoys the union's approval and encouragement. The church itself was registered about 50 years ago during Stalin's reign. Kobzar serves as the Baptist Union's senior pastor in Komi.

Persons with physical handicaps became an important part of the church's ministry a few years ago when 15 members of the City Society of Invalids attended the church. Several of them came to Christ, were baptized, and became members.

Pastor Kobzar envisions the training center as becoming a base to train indigenous pastors, missionaries, evangelists, teachers, and musicians to strengthen and plant churches in Komi.

The center accommodates up to 300 students. Students and teachers from the theological center will teach new converts and perform other services in the church and community.

But all the church's ministry hangs in the balance as they attempt to resolve their political difficulties and finish the buildings themselves. "God made it possible for these two buildings to exist without leaning on our own strength and money. We believe in him. It goes beyond the rational and into the spiritual," Kobzar said.

Why We Love This Deadly Sin

Staying angry protects us from getting hurt again, but at what price?

BARBARA BROWN TAYLOR

Then Peter came and said to him, "Lord, if another member of the church sins against me, how often should I forgive? As many as seven times?" Jesus said to him, "Not seven times, but, I tell you, seventy-seven times."

(Matt. 18:21-22, NRSV)

In case you have not noticed, Christianity is a religion in which the sinners have all the advantages. They can step on your feet 50 times and you are supposed to keep smiling. They can talk bad about you every time you leave the room and it is your job to excuse them with no thought of getting even. The burden is on you, because you have been forgiven yourself, and God expects you to do unto others as God has done unto you.

This is not a bad motivation for learning how to forgive. If God is willing to stay with me in spite of my meanness, my weakness, my stubborn self-righteousness, then who am I to hold those same things against someone else? Better I should confess my own sins than keep track of yours, only it is hard to stay focused on my shortcomings. I would so much rather stay focused on yours, especially when they are hurtful to me.

Staying angry with you is how I protect myself from you. Refusing to forgive you is not only how I punish you; it is also how I keep you from getting close enough to hurt me again, and nine times out of ten it works—only there is a serious side effect. It is called bitterness, and it can do terrible things to the human body and soul.

Once on a trip into Atlanta I stopped at a gift shop to buy a couple of wedding presents, some nice brass picture frames, which I asked the clerk to wrap. "Well, what is the occasion?" she snarled. "Are you going to tell me or am I supposed to guess?" I looked at her then for the first time and saw a heavy, middle-aged woman whose brow was all bunched up over two hard, cold eyes. Her mouth turned down at the sides like she had just tasted something rancid, and she had both her hands planted on the glass counter, leaning against it with such malice that I thought she might push it over on me if I irritated her any further.

Generally speaking, I get mad when someone comes at me like that, but this time I just got scared because I could see what her anger had done to her, and I for change in myself or in my relationships with others. Often I can see my own part in what I am angry about, and that helps, because if I had a hand in it, then I can concentrate on getting my hand back out of it again instead of spinning my wheels in blame. I can, in other words, figure out what my anger has to teach me and then let it go, but when my anger goes on and on without my learning or changing anything, then it is not plain anger anymore. It has become bitterness instead. It has become resentment, which a friend of mine calls "arthritis of the spirit."

wanted to get away from it before it did something similar to me. Actually, it was something stronger than plain anger that had twisted that woman's face. All by itself, anger is not that damaging. It is not much more than that quick rush of adrenaline you feel when you are being threatened. It tells you that something you hold dear is in danger—your property, your beliefs, your physical safety. I think of anger as a kind of flashing yellow light. "Caution," it says, "something is going on here. Slow down and see if you can figure out what it is."

When I do slow down, I can usually learn something from my anger, and if I am lucky I can use the energy of it to push

So there is another motivation for learning how to forgive—not only because we owe it to God, but because we owe it to ourselves. Because resentment deforms us. Because unforgiveness is a boomerang. We use it to protect ourselves—to hurt back before we can be hurt again—but it has a sinister way of circling right back at us so that we become the victims of our own ill will.

One summer the New York Times Book Review ran a series on the deadly sins. Joyce Carol Oates wrote on despair, Gore Vidal wrote on pride, and John Updike, of all people, wrote on lust. Mary Gordon's essay on anger was a real beauty, chiefly because she was willing to admit she knew a lot about it. One hot August afternoon, she wrote, she was in the kitchen preparing dinner for ten. Although the house was full of people, no one offered to help her chop, stir, or set the table. She was stewing in her own juices, she said, when her two small children and her 78-year-old mother insisted that she stop what she was doing and take them swimming.

They positioned themselves in the car, she said, leaning on the horn and shouting her name out the window so all the neighbors could hear them, loudly reminding her that she had promised to take them to the pond. That, Gordon said, was when she lost it. She flew outside and jumped on the hood of the car. She pounded on the windshield. She told her mother and her children that she was never, ever going to take any of them anywhere, and none of them was ever going to have one friend in any house of hers until the hour of their death—which, she said, she hoped was soon.

Then the frightening thing happened. "I became a huge bird," she said. "A carrion crow. My legs became hard stalks, my eyes were sharp and vicious. I developed a murderous beak. Greasy black feathers took the place of arms. I flapped and flapped. I blotted out the sun's light with my flapping." Even after she had been forced off the hood of the car, she said, it took her a while to come back to herself, and when she did, she was appalled, because she realized she had genuinely frightened her children. Her son said to her, "I was scared because I didn't know who you were."

"Sin makes the sinner unrecognizable," Gordon concluded, and the only antidote to it is forgiveness; but the problem is that anger is so exciting, so enlivening, that forgiveness can seem like a limp surrender. If you have ever cherished a resentment, you know how right it can make you feel to have someone in the world whom you believe is all wrong. You may not be up to admitting it yet, but one of the great benefits of having an enemy is that you get to look good by comparison. It also helps to have someone to blame for why your life is not turning out the way it was supposed to.

Several years ago on National Public Radio I heard Linda Wertheimer talking to a correspondent in the Middle East about the amazing moves toward peace that were then happening there between Israelis and Palestinians. "How are people reacting?" she asked him. "After all, losing an enemy is as upsetting as losing a friend." I hadn't thought about it that way before, but she is right. When you allow your enemy to stop being your enemy, all the rules change. Nobody knows how to act any more, because forgiveness is an act of transformation. It does not offer the adrenaline rush of anger, nor the feeling of power that comes from a well-established resentment. It is a quiet revolution, as easy to miss as a fist uncurling to become an open hand, but it changes people in ways that anger only wishes it could.

So why don't we do it more often. Because it is scary, to lay down your arm like that, to trade in your pride and your power on the off-chance that you may discover something more valuable than either of them. "To forgive," writes Mary Gordon, "is to give up the exhilaration of one's own unassailable rightness." And there is loss in that, only it is the loss of an illusion, and what is gained is unmistakably real: the chance to live again, free from the bitterness that draws the sweetness from our lives, that gives us scary faces and turns us into carrion crows who blot out the sun with our flapping. No one else does this to us. We do it to ourselves, but we do not have to.

We are being forgiven every day of our lives. We are being set free by someone who has arranged things so that we have all the advantages. We have choices. We have will. And we have an advocate who seems to know that we need lots of practice at this forgiveness business. How often should we forgive? Will seven times take care of it? "Not seven times," Jesus says, "but, I tell you, seventy-seven times." This is no chore. This is a promise, because forgiveness is the way of life. It is God's cure for the deformity our resentments cause us. It is how we discover our true shape, and every time we do it we get to be a little more alive. What God knows and we don't yet is that once we get the hang of it, seventy times seven won't be enough, not to mention seventy-seven. We'll be so carried away by it that we'll hope it never ends.

Don't Blame the Publishers!

Get a bunch of Christian intellectuals together and pretty soon they'll start in deploring the CBA. The initials stand for the Christian Booksellers Association, the organization that links Christian bookstores across the nation. Secular bookstores form the American Booksellers Association, or ABA.)

The shorthand is a little inaccurate, because it's not actually the booksellers themselves that us elbow-patch types deplore. It's the poor quality of many of the books they sell. These books are generally described as shallow, pious, self-indulgent, and trivializing; they're thought to be embarrassingly below the standards of the ABA (no pinnacle of wisdom itself).

Who is to blame for this sorry state of affairs? Those scoundrels, the publishers. These are the guys responsible for producing the physical books; they decide that a project is worth the investment, coax it from a writer, run it through an editor, and stamp their name at the bottom of the spine (of the book, that is). CBA publishers, it is said, are too enamored of profit and don't care enough for the nurture of souls.

I agree that much of what is on display in a Christian bookstore falls short of edifying, especially when a lot of it isn't even books. If you walked into our local secular bookstore and found a third of the floor space given over to plastic gewgaws and T-shirts with ringeworthy puns about your deepest beliefs, you would gather that they don't think of you as Mensa material.

But I am not convinced that publishers are the bad guys in this story. Book publishing looks like a glamorous, big bucks biz, but on the inside it's a lot more love than money. As Ken Auletta explained in a New Yorker magazine interview of publishing aptly titled "The Impossible Business," books require more expensive production and deliver tinier profits than most consumers realize. Manufacturing the physical book costs 10 percent of the cover price; distribution is 8 percent, marketing is another 7½, and business overhead adds 8 more. (Of course, these figures will vary in accord with the number of books sold. The more books printed, the lower the per-book manufacturing price; the more books sold, the lower the per-book overhead.)

The author gets a shockingly low 10 percent "royalty," rising to 15 when sales pass a certain number. A complicating factor: before the book is published Publishers are not forcing shallow books on an unwilling community.

(and, in many cases, before it is even written), the publisher often pays the author an advance, based on an estimate of how many copies will eventually sell. These estimates are routinely overgenerous; in 1996, inflated advances that didn't "earn out" cost New York publishers $20 to $50 million.

We've already got a typical-book cost to the publisher of 43–48 percent before we add two more factors: stores and distributors enjoy discounts of 40–50 percent, and—the surprise killer—unsold books can be returned for a full refund. Auletta writes, "Most content businesses [those that deal in entertainment or information, like TV, music, and software] expect to make profits of at least fifteen to twenty per cent, but publishing has never seen returns of that size."

Doing the math makes me reluctant to pin the blame on publishers. I can understand their pursuit of the blockbuster, since a big success provides coat-tails wide enough for smaller books to get a ride. Conservatives who favor the "free market" should be most sympathetic here. If manufacturers of everything from peanut butter to paint have the right to produce those goods they think will bring the best return, why can't publishers do the same? Are publishers the only group duty-bound to bring out products that won't break even in sales? We don't expect churches and ministries to be run on such a basis; we expect wise stewardship instead.

If not the publishers, who is to blame?

As with any commodity, it's a situation of supply and demand. Publishers are not forcing shallow books on an unwilling community. Buyers vote with their dollars as to which books they prefer. The depressing fact is that qualities deplored on the typical CBA shelf are exactly the ones consumers have demanded.

How can things be improved?

- Read book reviews, and when something sounds good to you, buy it. If you really like it, buy extra copies for your church library, your pastor, your best friend. Reward the industry for taking chances on more thoughtful books by proving that there is a market for them.

- Buy in hardback, if possible. I know, this is a crunch. But the initial hardback sales, before a book goes to paper, are where the numbers really count. Tell friends anytime they are buying you a gift to make it a hardback book. Give hardbacks yourself. Annie Dillard points out that current mainstream fiction is aimed at a single reader: the wealthy woman over 50. She's the only one thought to be buying hardback fiction. Change this.

- Start a book study group at your church. This not only increases book sales but also raises reader expectations as to what constitutes a worthwhile book.

An educated consumer is the direct cause of an improved CBA bookshelf. Let's roll up our elbow patches and get to work.

The Struggle for Lincoln's Soul

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian? In this article, excerpted from BOOKS & CULTURE (one of ten magazines published by Christianity Today, Inc.), Wheaton College historian Mark Noll probes the complex character of Lincoln's faith.

Lincoln's religion has been debated almost from the moment of his assassination 130 years ago. Even today, conservative preachers and broadcasters who bemoan the decline of Christian America repeat moving stories of Lincoln's deep piety, while populist naysayers deny such claims. Both groups seem to feel that if only Lincoln could be enlisted on their side—whether of evangelical faith or naturalistic rationalism—it would amount to a great victory for them. But what does the evidence show? The following are facts now well established:

- Lincoln was exposed to Calvinistic Baptist preaching as a child and to a clamor of competing Protestant preachers as a young man. In a strange way, he seems to have been both absorbed and repelled by these early influences.

- As a young man, Lincoln expressed views that differed from Christian orthodoxy—perhaps a thorough skepticism or maybe only the hypothesis of universal salvation.

- Lincoln only once wrote directly about his faith. When opponents in a race for Congress in 1846 accused him of lacking faith, Lincoln penned these careful, noncommittal words: "That I am not a member of any Christian Church, is true; but I have never denied the truth of the Scriptures; and I have never spoken with intentional disrespect of religion in general, or of any denomination of Christians in particular."

- Lincoln knew and quoted the Bible. Sometimes this quoting was only to find a striking metaphor, as in the House Divided speech of 1858. Other times the quotations were integral to the very substance of what he wanted to say. In 1864, Lincoln told a group of African Americans who had presented him with a Bible: "All the good the Saviour gave to the world was communicated through this book. But for it we could not know right from wrong."

- Lincoln valued prayer.

Many instances are recorded in diaries and letters written before Lincoln's death where the president either allowed White House visitors to pray with him or solicited their prayers. There are also several accounts, though less securely based, of Lincoln himself praying.

- After the deaths of his young sons in 1850 and 1862, Lincoln was comforted by two thoroughly conservative Presbyterian ministers (neither of whom was given to overstatement). They testified that, after these traumatic experiences, they witnessed a deepening of Lincoln's faith.

- In Washington, especially after the death of his son, Lincoln regularly attended New York Avenue Presbyterian Church. Sometimes he even came to the midweek prayer service but remained in a side room out of view of the congregation.

- Lincoln did not practice what might be called a "Christian lifestyle." Historian Philip Schaff lectured to European audiences in 1865 on the meaning of the Civil War. He said that when Lincoln was assassinated on Good Friday at Ford's Theater, European pietists were aghast that he was not observing the Holy Festival (which, in their experience, only infidels neglected), while American evangelicals were aghast that he was in a theater (which, in their experience, was associated with licentiousness, secularism, and prostitution).

If the above matters have proved factual, the following stories have proved bogus:

- Lincoln almost certainly was not converted in a Methodist camp meeting in 1839 as the organizer of the meeting claimed in 1897.

- Lincoln almost certainly did not write to a certain judge during his White House years to affirm, "My earlier views of the unsoundness of the Christian scheme of salvation and the human origin of the scriptures, have become clearer and stronger with advancing years and I see no reason for thinking I shall ever change them." This "document" was first produced in 1924 by Joseph Lewis at the annual banquet of New York's Freethinkers Society.

- An 1883 book includes an oft-quoted testimony to Lincoln's personal faith. The author wrote that he had taken the word from a newspaper, which in turn extracted them from a letter Lincoln wrote to an old friend in Illinois sometime in 1864 or early 1865. The quotation ran, "When I left Springfield I asked the people to pray for me. I was not a Christian. When I buried my son, the severest trial of my life, I was not a Christian. But when I went to Gettysburg and saw the graves of thousands of our soldiers, I then and there consecrated myself to Christ. Yes, I do love Jesus. No corroborative evidence has ever been found to legitimate this letter.

So, what was Lincoln's religion? Whether the solid have been separated from the spurious, the stories show Lincoln's respect for God, his own personal sense of living under the authority of divine providence, and his eagerness to commit to the Civil War to divine rule.

When it came to the war, Lincoln often displayed a higher, finer theology than did the nation's professional Christian theologians. Lincoln knew that God had not entered on either side. As early as 1862, he would write in a private memorandum "In the present civil war it is quite possible that God's purpose is something different from the purpose of either party."

Still, what this account and the other stories do not show is a clear-cut profession of orthodox faith: his faith was genuine, but only partially Christian. That was the testimony of those who knew Lincoln best, including his wife, who said shortly after his death that he was "a religious man always" but not "a technical Christian."

Paid in Full

The sacrifice of Calvary was not a part payment; it was a complete and perfect payment.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON

Our ancestors in Christ did not, by and large, learn the faith from the works of professional theologians. Their faith came by hearing (and reading), most often through the hearing of sermons.

As part of its occasional series of spiritual classics, CHRISTIANITY TODAY offers this vivid and image-rich exposition of justification by grace, delivered by Charles Haddon Spurgeon on April 5, 1857, at the Music Hall, Royal Surrey Gardens, England. Earlier generations of Christians were in the habit of reading printed sermons. This one is condensed from the New Park Street Pulpit, Vol. 3, No. 126.

"Being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus."

—Rom. 3:24

No scene in sacred history gladdens the soul like Calvary. Nowhere does the soul find such consolation as on that spot where misery reigned and agony reached its climax. There grace dug a fountain, which ever gushes with waters pure as crystal, each drop able to alleviate the agonies of mankind.

We have, this morning, a subject that may be the means of comforting God's saints seeing it takes its rise at the Cross and runs on in a rich stream of perennial blessing to all believers. We have in our text, first of all, the redemption of Christ Jesus; secondly, the justification of sinners flowing from it; and then thirdly, the manner of the giving of this justification, "freely by his grace."

First, then, we have the redemption that is in or by Christ Jesus.

The figure of redemption is very simple and has been frequently used in Scripture. When a prisoner has been made a slave it has been usual, before he could be set free, that a ransom should be paid. Now we, being, by the fall of Adam, prone to guiltiness and virtually guilty, we were by the irreproachable judgment of God given up to the vengeance of the law; justice claimed us to be his slaves forever unless we could pay a ransom, whereby our souls could be redeemed. We were poor as owlets. We were bankrupt debtors; all we had was sold; we were left naked, and poor, and miserable, and we could by no means find a ransom; it was just then that Christ stepped in, and, in the stead of all believers, paid the ransom that we might in that hour be delivered from the curse of the law and the vengeance of God and go our way free, justified by his blood.

Let me show you some qualities of the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. He has redeemed the multitude; not me alone, nor you alone, but "a multitude that no man can number." Christ hath bought for himself some out of every kingdom, and nation, and tongue, under heaven; he hath redeemed some of every rank, from the highest to the lowest; some of every color—black and white; some of every standing in society, the best and the worst.

Now, this ransom was all paid, and all paid at once. When Christ redeemed his people, he did not leave a single debt unpaid, nor yet one farthing for them to settle afterwards. The sacrifice of Calvary was not a part payment; it was a complete and perfect payment, and it obtained a complete and perfect remittal of all the debts of all believers that have lived, do live, or shall live, to the very end of time. On that day when Christ hung on the cross, the whole of the demands of the law were paid there and then by Jesus, the great high priest of all his people. And he paid it all at once too. So priceless was the ransom, so munificent the price demanded for our souls, one might have thought it marvelous had Christ paid it by installments. King's ransoms have sometimes been paid part at once, and part in dues afterwards, to run through years. But not so our Savior: once for all he gave himself a sacrifice and said, "It is finished," leaving nothing for him to do, nor for us to accomplish. Christ nailed that receipt to his "It is done, it is done; I have taken away the handwriting of ordinances, I have nailed it to the cross; who is he that shall condemn my people, or lay anything to their charge? for I have blotted out like a cloud their transgressions, and like a thick cloud their sins!"

And when Christ paid all this ransom, he did it all himself! Simon, the Cyrenian, might bear the cross; but Simon might not be nailed to it. That sacred circle of Calvary was kept for Christ alone. Two thieves were with him there; not righteous men, lest any should have said that the death of those two righteous men helped the Savior. No disciples shared his death; Peter was not dragged there to be beheaded, John was not nailed to a cross side by side with him; he was left there alone. He says, "I have trodden the wine press alone; and of the people there was none with me." The work was completely done by himself, without a helper.

And it was accepted. It was a goodly ransom. What could equal it? A soul "exceeding sorrowful even unto death"; a body torn with torture; a death of the most inhuman kind; and an agony of such a character that tongue cannot speak of it, nor can even man's mind imagine its horror. It was a goodly price. But say, was it accepted? There have been prices offered which never were accepted by the party to whom they were offered, and therefore the slave did not go free.

But this was accepted. When Christ declared that he would pay the debt, God sent the officer to arrest him, the payment was made, and Christ was locked up until the acceptance should have been ratified in heaven. Let your minds picture the buried Jesus. He slumbers in that narrow tomb. Now is the crisis of this world; it hangs trembling in the balance. Will God accept the ransom, or will he not? An angel comes from heaven with exceeding brightness; he rolls away the stone; and forth comes the captive, with no manacles upon his hands, with the grave clothes left behind; free, never more to die.

If God had not accepted his sacrifice, he would have been in his tomb at this moment; he never would have risen from his grave. But his resurrection was a pledge of God's accepting him.

Second, let me address myself to the effect of the ransom; being "justified freely by his grace through the redemption."

Now, what is the meaning of justification? Justification is a forensic term, employed always in a legal sense. A prisoner is brought to the bar of justice to be tried. There is only one way that prisoner can be justified; he must be found not guilty—proved to be a just man. If you find that man guilty, you cannot justify him. The Queen may pardon him, but she cannot justify him. He is as much a real criminal when he is pardoned as before.

Now, the wonder of wonders is that we are proved guilty, and yet we are justified. Can any earthly tribunal do that? No; it remained for the ransom of Christ to effect that which is an impossibility to any tribunal upon earth. We are all guilty. Read Romans 3:23—"For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." There the verdict of guilty is brought in, and yet we are immediately afterwards said to be justified freely by his grace.

Now, allow me to explain the way whereby God justifies a sinner. A prisoner has been tried and condemned to death. He cannot be justified, because he is guilty. But now suppose that some second party could be introduced who could take all that man's guilt upon himself, who could change places with that man and by some mysterious process become that man—the righteous man putting the rebel in his place and making the rebel a righteous man. We cannot do that in our courts. If I were to go before a judge, and he should agree that I should be committed for a year's imprisonment instead of some wretch who was condemned yesterday to a year's imprisonment, I might take his punishment, but not his guilt.

Now, what flesh and blood cannot do, that Jesus Christ did. Here I stand, the sinner. God says, "I will condemn that man; I will punish him." Christ puts me aside and stands in my stead. When the plea is demanded, Christ takes my guilt to be his own. When the punishment is to be executed, Christ says, "Punish me. I have put my righteousness on that man, and I have taken that man's sins on me. Father, consider that man to have been me. Let me endure his curse, and let him receive my blessing."

This marvelous doctrine of Christ's changing places with poor sinners is a doctrine of revelation, for it never could have been conceived by nature. No earthly monarch could have power to consent to such an exchange. But the God of heaven had a right to do as he pleased. In his infinite mercy he said, "Son of my love, you must stand in the sinner's place." This is the way we are saved, "being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus."

And now, let me further explain some of the characteristics of this justification. As soon as a repenting sinner is justified, his sins are cast into the depths of the sea. The man stands a guiltless man in the sight of God, accepted in the beloved. "What!" say you, "do you mean that literally?" Yes, I do. That is the doctrine of justification by faith.

*When a prisoner has been made a slave it has been usual, before he could be set free, that a ransom should be paid.
Christ took our guilt to be his own.*

But I am going a step further. The moment the man believes in Christ, he becomes righteous, he becomes meritorious, for, in the moment when Christ takes his sins he takes Christ's righteousness, so that, when God looks upon the sinner who but an hour ago was dead in sins, he looks upon him with as much affection as he ever looked upon his Son. He himself has said it—"As the Father loved me, so have I loved you." He loves us as much as his Father loved him. Can you believe such a doctrine as that? Does it not pass all thought? Well, it is a doctrine of the Holy Spirit whereby we must hope to be saved.

"But," says one, "no one is justified like that till he dies." Believe me, he is. If that young man over there has really believed in Christ this morning, he is as much justified in God's sight now as he will be when he stands before the throne. The glorified spirits above are no more acceptable to God than the poor man below, who is once justified by grace. It is a perfect washing, it is perfect pardon, perfect imputation; we are fully, freely, and wholly accepted, through Christ our Lord.

Just one more word here: Those who are once justified are justified irreversibly. As soon as a sinner takes Christ's place, and Christ takes the sinner's place, there is no fear of a second change. If Christ has once paid the debt, it will never be asked for again; if you are pardoned, you are pardoned forever. God does not give man a free pardon and then afterwards retract it and punish man: that be far from God. He says, "I have punished Christ; you may go free." And after that, we may rejoice that "being justified by faith we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

And now I hear someone cry, "That is an extraordinary doctrine." But it is a doctrine professed by all Protestant churches, though they may not preach it. It is the doctrine of the Church of England, of Luther, of the Presbyterian church; it is professedly the doctrine of all Christian churches; and if it seems strange in your ears, it is because your ears are estranged. It is the doctrine of Holy Writ, that none can condemn whom God justifies, and that none can accuse those for whom Christ died.

Third, I now close with the manner of giving this justification. There are some whose mouths are set awatring for this great gift of justification, some here who are saying, "Oh! if I could be justified! But, Sir, can I be justified?" Yes, poor soul, if you desire it; if God has made you willing, if you confess your sins, Christ is willing to take your rags and give you his righteousness forever.

"Well," says one, "must I be a holy man for many years, and then get it?" Listen! "Freely by his grace"; "freely," because there is no price to be paid for it; "By his grace," because it is not of our deservings.

"But, O Sir, I do not think God will forgive me unless I do something to deserve it." I tell you, if you bring in any of your deservings, you shall never have it. God gives away his justification freely; if you bring anything to pay for it, he will throw it in your face.

If I could preach justification to be bought by you at a sovereign apiece, who would go out of the place without being justified? If I would preach justification by walking a hundred miles, would we not be pilgrims tomorrow morning, every one of us? If I were to preach justification by whippings and torture, there are very few here who would not whip themselves severely. But when it is freely, freely, men turn away. "What! am I to have it for nothing at all, without doing anything?" Yes, Sir, you are to have it for nothing, or else not at all.

"But may I not go to Christ, lay some claim to his mercy, and say, Lord, justify me because I am not so bad as others?" It will not do, Sir, because it is "by his grace."

"But may I not offer this plea, I mean to be better?" No, Sir, it is "by his grace." You insult God by bringing your counterfeit coin to pay for his treasures. What poor ideas men have of the value of Christ's gospel if they think they can buy it! A rich man once, when he was dying, had a notion that he could buy a place in heaven by building a row of almshouses. A good man stood by his bedside, and said, "How much more are you going to leave?"

"Twenty thousand pounds."

Said he, "That would not buy enough for your foot to stand on in heaven; for the streets are made of gold there, and therefore of what value can your gold be?" Nay, friends, we cannot buy heaven with gold nor good works, nor prayers, nor anything in the world.

But how is it to be got? Why it is to be got for asking only. As many of us as know ourselves to be sinners may have Christ for asking for him. Do you know that you want Christ? You may have Christ! "Whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely." But if you say, "No, Sir, I mean to do a great many good things, and then I will believe in Christ," then you will be damned if you hold by such delusions. I earnestly warn you.

"But are we not to do good works?" Certainly you are; but you are not to trust in them. You must trust in Christ wholly, and then do good works afterwards.

"But," says one, "I think if I were to do a few good works, it would be a little recommendation when I came." It would not, Sir; they would be no recommendation at all. Let a beggar come to your house in white kid gloves and say he is very badly off; would the white kid gloves recommend him to your charity? "No," you would say, "you are a miserable impostor; you do not want anything, and you shall not have anything, either! Out with you!" The best uniform for a beggar is rags, and the best uniform for a sinner to go to Christ in is for him to go just as is, with nothing but sin about him.

I do not say this to urge any man to continue in sin. God forbid! If you continue in sin, you must not come to Christ; you cannot; your sins will hamper you. No, Sir, it is repentance; it is the immediate leaving off the sin. But neither repentance nor by leaving off your sin can save you. It is Christ, Christ, Christ only.

But I know many of you will go away and try to build up your own Babel-tower to get to heaven. Some of you will do the ceremony way: you will lay the foundation of the structure with infant baptism, build confirmation on it, and the Lord's Supper. "I shall go to heaven," you say. "Do not I keep Good Friday and Christmas Day? I am a better man than those dissenters. Do I not say more prayers than anyone?" You will be a long mile going up that treadmill before you get an inch higher.

Another one says, "I will go and study the Bible and believe right doctrine, and I have no doubt that by believing right doctrine I shall be saved." Indeed you will not! You can be no more saved by believing right doctrine than you can by doing right actions.

"There," says another, "I like that; I will go and believe in Christ and live as I live." Indeed, you will not! For if you believe in Christ he will not let you live as your flesh likes; by his Spirit he will constrain you to mortify its affections and lusts. If he gives you the grace to make you believe, he will give you the grace to live a holy life afterwards. You cannot believe in Christ unless you renounce every fault and resolve to serve him with all purpose of heart. What have you to do but to believe this and trust in him?

Faith is like this: There was a captain of a man-of-war whose young son was very fond of running up the ship's rigging; and one time, running after a monkey, he ran up the mast, till at last he got to the maintruck. Now, the maintruck is like a large, round table put on to the mast, so that when the boy was on the maintruck he had plenty of room; but the difficulty was that he could not reach the mast under the table; he was not tall enough to get down from this maintruck, reach the mast, and so descend. He managed to get up there, but he never could get down. His father looked up in horror.

A few moments his son would fall down, and be dashed to pieces on the deck! The captain shouted, "Boy, the next time the ship lurches, throw yourself into the sea." It was his only way of escape; he might be picked up out of the sea, but he could not be rescued if he fell on the deck. The poor boy looked down on the sea; it was a long way; he could not bear the idea of throwing himself into the roaring current; he thought it looked dangerous. So he clung to the maintruck with all his might, though there was no doubt that he must soon let go and perish.

The father called for a gun, and pointing it up at him, said, "Boy, the next time the ship lurches, throw yourself into the sea, or I'll shoot you!" The boy knew his father would keep his word; the ship lurches, over went the boy, splash, into the sea, and out went brawny arms after him. The sailors rescued him and brought him on deck.

Now we, like the boy, are in a position of extraordinary danger, which neither you nor I can possibly escape of ourselves. Unfortunately, we have got some good works of our own, like that maintruck, and we cling to them so fondly that we never will give them up. Christ knows that unless we do give them up, we shall be dashed to pieces at the last. He, therefore, says, "Sinner, let go of your own trust, and drop into the sea of my love." We look down and say, "Can I be saved by trusting in God? He looks as if he were angry with me, and I could not trust him."

Must the weapon of destruction be pointed directly at you? Must you hear the dreadful threat—"He that believeth not shall be damned?" It is with you now as with that boy—your position is one of imminent peril, and your slighting the Father's counsel makes peril more perilous. You must do it or else you perish! Let go your hold! That is faith when the poor sinner lets go, drops down, and is saved; and the very thing which looks as if it would destroy him is the means of his being saved. Oh! believe on Christ, poor sinners; believe on Christ. You who know your guilt and misery, come, cast yourselves upon him; come, and trust my Master and you shall never trust him in vain; but you shall find yourselves forgiven, and go your way rejoicing in Christ Jesus. CI

BEING THERE

Culture and Formation in Two Theological Schools

JACKSON W. CARROLL, BARBARA G. WHEELER, DANIEL O. ALESHIRE, and PENNY LONG MARLER

This book takes a close-up look at theological education in the U.S. today. The authors' goal is to understand the way in which institutional culture affects the outcome of the educational process. To that end, they undertake ethnographic studies of two seminaries—one evangelical and one mainline Protestant—and offer fascinating portraits of two very different intellectual, religious, and social worlds.

OUR LADY OF THE EXILE

Diasporic Religion at a Cuban Catholic Shrine in Miami

THOMAS A. TWEED

Our Lady of the Exile is a study of Cuban-American popular Catholicism, focusing on the shrine of Our Lady Charity in Miami. Drawing on a wide range of sources and using both historical and ethnographic methods, Tweed examines the religious life of the Cuban exiles who visit the shrine.

ON GOD AND DOGS

A Christian Theology of Compassion for Animals

STEPHEN H. WEBB

In this engaging and thought-provoking book, Webb brings a Christian perspective to bear on the subject of our responsibility to animals, looked at through the lens of our relations with pets—especially dogs. He argues that the emotional bond with companion animals should play a central role in the way we think about animals in general, and—against the more extreme animal liberationists—defends the intermingling of the human and animal worlds.

GOD'S LONG SUMMER:
STORIES OF FAITH AND CIVIL RIGHTS, by Charles Marsh (Princeton University Press,
276 pp.; $24.95, hardcover).
Reviewed by Randy Frame.

Those who read Charles Marsh's God's Long Summer will no longer be able to hear unqualified statements about how grand life was in the fifties without considering such sentiments at best hopelessly naïve and, at worst, morally repugnant. With vivid description and chilling analysis, Marsh evokes the violence and oppression in the South of the civil-rights era.

The reference in the title is to the summer of 1964, a season that in many ways served as a cradle for the movement toward freedom. Though this pivotal summer functions as a regular reference point, the book is organized primarily around five detailed character studies. All five persons are motivated by their understanding of Christian faith, yet the presuppositions, values, and goals that inform their behavior during God's long summer and beyond could not be more disparate.

We meet Fannie Lou Hamer, a poor, uneducated black woman from rural Mississippi who found herself in the national spotlight at the 1964 Democratic National Convention in Atlantic City. Having led a nonviolent movement aimed at gaining fair political representation for all, she became vice-presidential-hopeful Hubert Humphrey's "project." Humphrey had been dispatched by President Lyndon Johnson, who referred to Hamer as "that illiterate." Humphrey's options were to extinguish the fires of discontent within the party or risk seeing his name dropped from the ticket. Hamer looked him in the eye and said, "Now if you lose this job of vice president because you are right, everything will be all right. God will take care of you. But if you take [the vice-presidential nomination] this way, why, you will never be able to do any good for civil rights, for poor people, for peace or any of those things you talk about. Senator Humphrey, I'm gonna pray to Jesus for you."

We meet Sam Bowers, who, as Imperial Wizard of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, believed that God had called him to eliminate "heretics," by which he meant primarily Negroes and Jews. In reference to accusations that his militant activities included planned killings, Bowers publicly boasted, "A jury would not dare convict a white man for killing a nigger in Mississippi."

We meet Douglas Hudgins, a highly educated and esteemed pastor of First Baptist Church of Jackson (Miss.) who could never dream of committing an act of violence, but who preached that the Gospel had nothing to do with civil rights. Marsh writes that "the success of Bowers's violent mission depended largely on the kind of Gospel Hudgins eloquently preached to white Christians in the spacious sanctuary of First Baptist Church."

We meet Ed King, a white man who, like Bowers, grew up reaping the full benefits of his race and thinking nothing of it. But during his senior year of high school, a tornado hit his hometown of Vicksburg, Mississippi. He saw that the firetrucks and ambulance could not negotiate the mud-ridden streets of black communities, and his eyes were opened for the first time to racial injustice. His commitment to civil rights would cost him, among other things, his relationship with his parents.

Finally, we meet Cleveland Sellers, whose diagnosis of the problem paralleled Hamer's and King's, but who, after giving them a chance, advocated a form of black power that opened the doors to violence while closing the doors to whites.

In his treatment of each of the five, Marsh's theological and moral values come to the surface, but not in an excessively judgmental way, and certainly not in ways that compromise his essential commitment to an accurate and fair telling of the facts. By taking this approach, the author allows readers to explore their own thoughts and arrive at their own conclusions.

Many will find the results haunting. Haunting because we realize that this painful era is not as far removed from our own day as we'd like it to be. Haunting because we can no longer dismiss racist ideologies as mere ignorance; they are in fact highly developed theologies. Haunting also because of an ironic yearning for the turbulent sixties, during which it seems the moral choices were clearer than today's. But this book is haunting most of all because of the bits and pieces of ourselves we see in each of the five characters. Thus, Marsh's work speaks directly to the development of our own moral lives.

Fortunately, despite his essentially objective approach, the author ultimately allows the now-deceased "Mrs. Hamer" to emerge as the heroine. "Undoubtedly," Marsh writes, "she would look upon the deracinated Hudgins and the villainous Bowers with indignation and outrage. Yet her table would not be closed to them." He adds, "In the end, Mrs. Hamer shows us that in loving we become the people we are supposed to be." CT

HISTORICAL DICTIONARY OF THE ORTHODOX CHURCH

By Michael Prokurat, Alexander Golitzin, and Michael D. Peterson Scarecrow Press
528 pp.; $89, hardcover
Reviewed by Gregory Mathewes-Green, a priest of the Antiochian Orthodox Christian Archdiocese and pastor of Holy Cross Mission, Baltimore.

The recent growth in awareness of the Orthodox Church has preceded the availability of reliable resource materials in English. Now, however, that unfortunate situation is being remedied. Among other new releases in the field, the Historical Dictionary of the Orthodox Church goes some distance toward filling a real need. Accessible to the layman as well as the academic, entries in the volume are drawn from the liturgical, theological, and ascetic life of Orthodoxy. Some helpful drawings are included, such as the simple illustration that accompanies and makes clearer the entry on "iconostasis." Perhaps most valuable is the concluding bibliography, almost a fifth of the book, broken into 12 categories.

I resist the four-star commendation for two reasons: the inordinately high price, though I grant that such is irrelevant to the book's scholarship; and the authors' penchant for some odd editorial choices. (For example, should the somewhat important modern lay theologian Lot-Borodine receive more print than the extremely important Mark of Ephesus?) Nevertheless, this volume will be a useful reference for both Orthodox and non-Orthodox readers. CT

"It Causes Me to Tremble"

The history of African-American literature reflects the decline of Christian influence in our culture.

THE NORTON ANTHOLOGY OF AFRICAN AMERICAN LITERATURE, ed. by Henry Louis Gates, Jr., and Nellie Y. McKay (Norton, 2,665 pp.; $49.95, hardcover; $44.95, paper). Reviewed by Philip G.

Wiken, associate minister at Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia.

African-American literature has always had to fight to win acceptance. The first black poetry published in the English language came from the pen of Phillis Wheatley. When Wheatley's poems first appeared in the 1770s, the intelligentsia in Boston doubted they had been written by "a young Negro Girl, who was but a few Years since, brought an uncultivated Barbarian from Africa." Suspicions were aroused because the girl's poetic style was influenced by John Milton and Alexander Pope, as well as by her studies in Latin.

A committee of some 20 judges was assembled to determine if Wheatley actually could have written the poems herself. The committee included Gov. Thomas Hutchinson, the Reverend Charles Chauncy, and the renowned John Hancock. After a lengthy oral examination, these men reached a unanimous verdict: Phillis Wheatley was indeed the author of the poems published under her name.

Two hundred years later there is no longer any doubt about the legitimacy of African-American literature. The recent publication of The Norton Anthology of African American Literature brings together in one volume more than two centuries of African-American letters. Spirituals, folktales, sermons, poems, slave narratives, entire novels—the anthology has them all. It also has an Audio Companion CD to help preserve the rhythms of black vernacular. The volume offers weighty proof of the excellence of the African-American contribution to American culture.

Readers of the Norton Anthology will be struck by the distinctively Christian origins of the first African-American literature. The anthology begins with more than a dozen spirituals; the first is the gospel itself (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3–4):

*Were you there when they crucified
my Lord?*

*Were you there when they crucified
my Lord?*

Oh! Sometimes it causes me to tremble, tremble, tremble.

*Were you there when they crucified
my Lord?*

The Christian vision of early African-American literature was not limited to spirituals and gospel songs. Wheatley's poem "On Being Brought from Africa to America" (1773) views slavery in the light of sanctification.

*'Twas mercy brought me from my Pagan land,
Taught my benighted soul to understand
That there's a God, that there's a Saviour too:
Once I redemption neither sought nor knew.
Some view our sable race with scornful eye,
"Their colour is a diabolic die."
Remember, Christians, Negros, black as Cain,
May be refin'd, and join th' angelic train.*

Both the poet and her readers were steeped in the Christian world-view. This made it possible to communicate the biblical truth about racial reconciliation through poetry.

The strong Christian element in African-American literature has gradually disappeared. The wealth of biblical allusions and theological reasoning in the old slave literature of David Walker and Frederick Douglass has been squandered. Although there are redemptive themes in the work of major contemporary writers such as Alice Walker and Toni Morrison, black literature has lost its distinctively Christian vision. Thus the history of African-American letters is one chapter in the story of the long, slow decline of Christian influence on American culture.

The same decline can be traced in American literature in general. This serves as a reminder of how much black Christians and white Christians share. In his speech at the March on Washington for Civil Rights in 1963, Martin Luther King, Jr., rightly observed that "many of our white brothers . . . have come to realize that their destiny is tied up with our destiny and they have come to realize that their freedom is inextricably bound to our freedom." King's assertion has particular force when it is applied to the church, where blacks and whites form one body in Christ.

The Norton Anthology of African American Literature ends on a gloomy note. The last writer in the collection is Essex Hemphill, who died of AIDS in 1995. Hemphill's poetry does not embrace the good, the true, or the beautiful. Instead, it revels in lewd homosexual acts, even finding salvation in them ("Everytime we kiss we confirm the new world coming").

The difference between the poetry of Phillis Wheatley and the poetry of Essex Hemphill speaks volumes about what has happened in American culture during the last 200 years. Where we are is a long, long way from "Were You There?" Yet the gospel message of the first spirituals is as true today as it was when slaves first sang it on American plantations. Black and white, it is true for us all.

Knowing Jehovah

What the Old Testament teaches us about spirituality.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF THE LORD: AN OLD TESTAMENT SPIRITUALITY, by Deryck Sheriffs (London: Paternoster Press, 363 pp.; $24.99, paper). Reviewed by Donald Bloesch, emeritus professor of theology, University of Dubuque Theological Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa. His book Jesus Christ: Savior and Lord, the fourth volume in his projected seven-volume systematic theology, has recently been published by InterVarsity Press.

Hebraic themes with New Testament faith and also explains why these themes are relevant to the church today.

The author makes a persuasive case that biblical spirituality is oriented about the theme of a life journey in which people of faith gain a deeper understanding of the will of God for their lives. He contrasts this approach with that of the mystical tradition of the church, which upholds the way of ascent to a state beyond temporality. In the biblical perspective, we do not climb up into the Godhead (as in radical mysticism); instead, we are raised by divine grace into fellowship with God and the whole company of the saints. The pilgrimage of faith does not lead us out of the world but more deeply into the trials and afflictions of the world. We do not aspire to be divine but strive to be authentically human as we fulfill our daily tasks in society.

Another prominent thrust of biblical spirituality is the "fear of the Lord," which involves keeping ourselves humble before God in the service of his name. The fear of God does not entail being reduced to nothingness through servile subjection to a domineering Master, but instead being raised to life and vitality through serving the Master who is at the same time the Friend. The fear of the Lord is not an emotional moment but a learned behavior that spans a lifetime.

Sheriffs constantly warns against confusing biblical personal religion with an otherworldly mysticism that is enamored with the preternatural and occult. Biblical spirituality is not a mystical quest but social embodiment that involves lending a helping hand to people in need. Hebraic spirituality always entails a strong ethi-

SEEDS OF HOPE:
A HENRI NOUWEN READER

Edited by Robert Durbach
Doubleday
2nd ed., 296 pp.; $11, paper

The first edition of this thematic reader was published in 1989. After Henri Nouwen's death in 1996, editor Robert Durbach prepared a revised and expanded edition with memorial tributes. The very helpful annotated bibliography that concludes the volume has also been updated.

Durbach has selected brief excerpts—snippets, in most cases, rather than extended passages. These are organized under a wide range of topical headings: "Solitude," "Intimacy and Sexuality," "The Search for God," "Career and Vocation," "The Face of Christ," to name only a few. The book is not intended for consecutive reading but rather for meditation.

"What strikes me, being back in the United States," one typical entry begins, "is the full force of the restlessness, the loneliness, and the tension that holds so many people. The conversations I had today were about spiritual survival. So many of my friends feel overwhelmed by the many demands made on them; few feel the inner peace and joy they so much desire."

At first we may be inclined to dismiss this as no more than a cliché, but it is one of the great strengths of Nouwen's work that he is not afraid of simplicity. He is a child-like truth teller, and he speaks to our hearts. CT

lical, prophetic spirituality also includes contemplation—gazing upon the splendor of God (as in Ps. 27:4), but this is not to be interpreted literally. "Seeing" is done with the mind, not the physical eye. Contemplation involves an experience of the beauty and glory of God as communicated to us through external signs, such as the temple and the ark.

Throughout the book Sheriffs tries to show the distance between Israelite spirituality and that of the surrounding culture. Time and again the biblical authors will take pagan mythical themes and relate them to the events of sacred history. The biblical poets freely use mythological imagery because they are not its prisoner. Their task often takes the form of demythologization. The elements of nature are not personified as deities, as in pagan religion, but are seen as being under the rule and guidance of the living God.

Unlike the mystical or Hellenic ethos, biblical spirituality does not offer techniques for knowing God or attaining holiness. Nor does the Bible present us with a developmental spirituality. We do not ascend to ever-higher stages of faith and holiness (as in the higher life movement), but we experience critical moments in our spiritual journey in which we are given a fuller grasp of God's will for our lives. Yet this fuller vision needs to be given to us anew as we fulfill the tasks of daily existence.

Echoing themes of narrative theology, Sheriffs contends that a theology that is truly biblical will be "engaged, embedded and embodied, and is not a display of universal, timeless and hygienically bottled truths." He not surprisingly describes the Bible as "an unfinished story."

Sheriffs rightly reminds us that the kind of holiness that Scripture endorses is a this-worldly holiness, one that is lived out in the tasks and tedium of daily life. The spiritual and the natural intersect and, indeed, are inseparable. He sees biblical relevance in the modern maxim, "What is natural should become thoroughly spiritual and what is spiritual should become perfectly natural." While this emphasis can garner some biblical support, it tends to lose sight of the biblical fact that the natural always points beyond itself to the spiritual. The natural can be a sacramental sign of the spiritual but must never be identified with the spiritual, for otherwise we are in the camp of pantheism, which denies the infinite qualitative difference between the divine and the human.

This book is a welcome addition to the growing number of books on spiritual-al thrust in which faith is fulfilled in daily obedience to the divine commandment. Yet Sheriffs readily concedes that scripture does not exclude the paranormal or the charismatic. If we focus our attention solely upon temporal and material concerns we will risk "constructing a model that does not encompass and integrate all the available facts of human experience, or all of the evidence."

Sheriffs also warns against the danger of ritualism, which reduces the practice of faith to prescribed rituals and surrounds the life of faith with stifling taboos. He cautions that "prayer may rapidly degenerate into the repetitive muttering of magical incantations, whether in liturgical or charismatic settings." The heart of biblical prayer is earnest supplication, though silence is also necessary to prepare ourselves to hear God's word and know God's will. The Bible sharply contradicts what he calls "Mesopotamian spirituality," one that is "regulated by experts with sanctuary regulations, rituals, physical objects and fixed formulae deemed efficacious." We gain holiness and freedom through the practice of love and mercy, not through systematic avoidance of "foods, art forms, music, hair or dress styles."

The author also gives a salutary admonition against both unwholesome asceticism and prosperity teaching:

There is a spirituality that expects health, wealth and prosperity, that explains persistent symptoms of ill health as due to lack of faith, that disapproves of expressing grief in bereavement, that passes off responsibility for choices and their consequences by talking about them as divine guidance, that escapes the pain in others with clichés and so on.

He goes on to contend that counterfeit spirituality is often marked by "a triumphalism that ignores the real state of the church and the world, denies the fact of a common humanity in favour of a false separateness, or offers a formula for spiritual arrival that glosses over the reality of biding human sinfulness."

While averse to mystical interpretations that have their source in Hellenism rather than the Old Testament, Sheriffs makes an important place for meditation and contemplation. In biblical piety, meditation involves internalizing the Torah. We are called to fix our attention not on timeless truths but on the practical implications of the law of God in daily life. Another prominent focus in biblical meditation is on the goodness of God's creation. A bib-

ity. While Sheriffs's emphasis is on daily obedience to God's commands, he also sees the role of silence, adoration, and contemplation in the life of the Christian. In addition to a spirituality of social involvement, he speaks of the need for a spirituality of "stopping," whereby we disengage ourselves from the turmoils of life in order to be still before the Lord and draw on the spiritual resources of our faith in a retreatlike setting. He points to the ecumenical religious community of Taizé (in southeastern France) as trenchantly speaking to the needs of younger people for a deeper anchorage in spiritual reality.

Christians of every persuasion can learn from The Friendship of the Lord, for its author is thoroughly immersed in the study of Scripture as well as keenly sensitive to the desperate spiritual needs of people living in a secularized and vacuous culture. The book could have been strengthened had Sheriffs acknowledged that many of the themes of biblical spirituality that he upholds have been enacted in the lives of some of the great mystics of the church. Touched by an Angel

Buechner does Tobit.

ON THE ROAD WITH THE ARCHANGEL, by Frederick Buechner (HarperSan Francisco, 149 pp.; $16, hardcover). Reviewed by David Stewart, librarian at Regent College, Vancouver, B.C., Canada.

Even when Frederick Buechner is at the peak of his form (as he is in this new novel), it is difficult for a reviewer to describe exactly the quality of his work: so undemanding, so unmagisterial, so far removed from the sweeping, expansive style of novelists whose skills are less subtle. Buechner's distinctive gift lies in giving voice to the streak of ambiguity that runs through human existence. A character like Leo Bebb (The Book of Bebb) may be a saint, or a huckster, or a little of both: we never quite know. For Buechner, such questions rarely receive a definitive answer. What is certain is that, amid the ambiguity that is our lot, the Almighty is at work, quietly and profoundly.

On the Road with the Archangel is Buechner's version of the apocryphal Book of Tobit, told from the standpoint of the archangel Raphael. As in the past, Buechner's terrain is the tragicomic overlap that exists between "the ways of God as understood by men" and "the ways of men as understood by God."

The desolate prayers of two people set the story in motion. Tobit is a Jew of Nineveh who has lost both his sight and his sense of hope. He implores God to grant him deliverance through death. Sarah is a young woman from a city called Ecbatana. She has fallen under the protection of a demon, Asmodeus, who secretly loves her and who has gruesomely bumped off a succession of seven unwanted fiancés, with the result that Sarah has been cast as a murdering sorceress. She too prays for death.

Certain that God will heed his prayer, Tobit wants to ensure that his wife, Anna, and son, Tobias, will be provided for after his death, and so he sends his son on a mission to bring back some of his fortune, left with a friend in a far city. Raphael (now in human form) signs on as a traveling companion and shepherds the son through everything, including his eventual meeting and marrying Sarah (here is where the answer to the two desperate prayers intersects).

What it adds up to is an unforgettably funny and lovely picture of unlikely

Providence, portraying with extraordinary empathy ordinary, flawed folk who at any given moment have only the vaguest idea of what they are doing, or of the import of their actions for themselves or others; how much their wills and hearts and desires matter to the Holy One; how their dramas are caught up in his.

Toward the end, when Raphael is about to disclose his true identity, he enjoins Tobias and his wife to live generously in response: "I mean that though you must never tell the secrets of a king . . . nothing is more pleasing to the Holy One than when you tell about the secret things he is always doing for people or trying to do if they give him half a chance. . . . Tell people about those things and never forget them yourself." Good advice for us, too. CT

The Word Became Art

As a conservative Protestant raised in a Rockwellesque New England farming community, Sandra Bowden is acutely aware of the Protestant preference for words over images. As an artist, it has caused her no small concern that her signature motif has always been fragments of words layered into every work of art she signs.

"At one point I had to deal with some very distressing questions. Here I had spent my whole life in a church focused on words," Bowden explains. "I used to think, 'What have I done? Isn't this art just compounding the whole problem?'—until I began to 'ger' the theology properly. By the Word of the Lord the heavens were made; Jesus as the Word-made-flesh points far beyond the physical [emphasis hers]. So the Word must have a power beyond cognitive thought, beyond logic. That's the mystery I've spent a lifetime hunting for in my art—that veiled kind of expression which doesn't explain itself right away."

Choose any work from Bowden's prolific output and you uncover fragments of Hebrew calligraphy and segments of timeworn antique Bibles or commentaries, and in as many as 40 languages.

LAYER UPON LAYER

Fascinated by the form and historical weight of Hebrew, Bowden began studying it in 1972 with an orthodox rabbi. In 1980 she made the first of four visits to Israel and immersed herself in ancient Israelite culture, archaeology, geology, and ritual—admitting she is "always the student, but never a scholar." What eventually emerged was her Israelite Tel Suite, cross-sectioned profiles of Canaanite cities conquered by Joshua in the thirteenth century B.C. Concealed archaeological features or important artifacts layered into the strata of Tels Megiddo, Hazor, Gezer, and Lachish relate directly to Old Testament references. Tel Megiddo, for example, is overlaid with a royal lion seal mentioning King Jeroboam. Excavations of Tel Gezer, part of Solomon's dowry, revealed Israelite burial sites and a potsherd inscribed with an agricultural calendar.

Bowden later researched colors mentioned in the Torah, attempting to identify historically accurate dyes that could have made Joseph's coat, or the hues of precious gems used in the ephods of the levitical priests.

Bowden's work crosses boundaries between synagogues, churches, and seminars particularly well; her primary clientele on the east coast is, in fact, Jewish. Her ambassadorial finesse has allowed her to forge close ties with Jewish art dealers and rabbinical mentors over the years at annual Judaica conferences and synagogue art exhibits. "Probably the most significant meal I ever had in my life," says this attractive, well-traveled grandmother of four, "was Shabbat supper with a Jewish couple in Israel. This was not 'put on' for me. This was every Friday night.

"The world stopped; we ate ceremoniously, and they sang songs they had sung in their families for generations. They were absolutely in love with God. At that point I understood that differences could only be resolved by Jesus."

Yet, Bowden confesses, "In any Christian setting I can show all the Jewish stuff, but in the Jewish setting I am more careful. I'll still use Greek text, gorgeous Bibles from the 1850s layered underneath Hebrew and English, even Vietnamese. But I won't show crucifixion imagery. If I'm in a Jewish show I'll have a binder that explains my Christian background. The work is strong enough—it has enough integrity that I don't have to hide my Christian faith. But I would never make Jewish people uneasy by evangelizing [overtly]. My life is a testimony in front of them." And, as Bowden insists, "We share a common text"—figu-

The Muse of the Mountains

What do the mountains sound like? Jerry Smith, musician and artisan, knows. They sang to him. Smith heard the Great Smoky Mountains when he visited western North Carolina for the first time. "I drove into these mountains and was moved as deeply as anything that has ever happened to me in my life," he says.

Leaving college, girlfriend, home, and dog, Smith moved from northeastern Ohio to Asheville, North Carolina, for the muse was calling him. He heard it again when he walked into the student union center at Warren Wilson College in Swannanoa, North Carolina (where he subsequently enrolled), and heard David Holt, head of the Appalachian Music Program, playing the banjo along with fiddler Lynn Shaw and John McCutchin on the hammered dulcimer.

"I was immediately drawn to the hammered dulcimer," Smith says. "I sat down behind this dulcimer player and watched him play. I was flabbergasted." Smith, who had never studied music and couldn't read it (and still can't), asked where he could purchase this trapezoidal instrument with its 40 to 100 strings, played with mallets. The reply was, "You couldn't buy one anywhere." Still, the suggestion was made that he could order information through the Smithsonian Institution. So he sent 50 cents and received a brochure that explained (more or less) how to make a dulcimer.

LIKE DANCING WITH YOUR HANDS

Smith built his first hammered dulcimer out of plywood and cement nails. (A hammered dulcimer should not be confused with a mountain dulcimer, which has three to six strings and is plucked.) His second dulcimer was better, and he decided to try playing it. "First of all, it worked. That surprised me," he says. "I was also surprised at how easy it was to play. Every time I pulled it out I was surrounded by people. I couldn't play beans on it, but everybody thought I was a genius. I would get a melody in my head and then find the notes on the dulcimer.

"Playing a dulcimer is like dancing with your hands. You're dancing the melody out. It's the most wonderful way to play a musical instrument," Smith says. Today, some 23 years later, he has built more than 670 dulcimers and has a waiting list.

Smith has made three recordings—a "trilogy"—that bring expression both to his spiritual longings and to his love for the mountains. The first, The Strayaway Child (1981), produced with Tom Fellenbaum, bespeaks, in classical Celtic hymns and jigs, the restlessness of his heart during his pre-Christian days. Though "The Dancing Dog/Blarney Pilgrim" ends discordantly in nonresolution, it segues into "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring," which suggests, says Jerry's wife, Lisa, that "he felt he was 'straying away' from something"—as if the mountains were crying.

Heart Dance, the second in the trilogy (1986), was recorded after Smith's conversion and suggests a gentler but more resolved longing. Both his father and a close friend had recently died, giving the music a quiet, reflective feeling.

Lisa Smith accompanies her husband on the lute for the third recording, Homecoming (1992), which begins and ends with "What Child Is This?" The Brentwood Music label has recently taken over all three recordings.

Smith continues to be consumed with building dulcimers in the workshop behind his house, and he has turned down attractive offers for special projects in order to keep his heart close to God's. "I'm trying to experience his joy, hear him, and worship him," he says, "because I know the kind of joy and the kind of peace this music can bring to people."

A PROCESS OF PERSONAL INQUIRY

Bowden is also front and center in the dialogue regarding contemporary Christian art. She is an active advocate for Christians in the Visual Arts and has been involved in CIVA since the group's founding. Her ambassadorial role as CIVA president since 1992 has taken her to the Vatican, Jerusalem, Berkeley, Montreal, and New York City. This year, after moving her home studio from New York to Cape Cod, Massachusetts, along with her entrepreneurial husband, she has begun preparations for CIVA's twentieth anniversary celebration in 1999.

Because the foundation underlying all her work is the eternal God, this artist feels free to ask unlimited questions. "Sometimes art is a process of personal inquiry," Bowden says. "My work is a record of questions I've had all my life, and the work continually raises new questions. I just follow it along." Apart from the fact that her natural curiosity and abbinically insistent questions never cease, Bowden seems to have an infinite number of ideas for future series. But then, since the source that unifies all her work is the infinite God, who should be surprised?

DOWNSIZING GOD

Our evangelical culture tends to take the awesome reality of a transcendent God who is worthy to be feared and downsize Him so He could fit into our “buddy system.” The way we talk about Him, the way we pray, and, more strikingly, the way we live shows that we have somehow lost our sense of being appropriately awestruck in the presence of a holy and all-powerful God. It’s been a long time since we’ve heard a good sermon on the “fear of God.”

If God were to show up visibly, many of us think we’d run up to Him and high-five Him for the good things He has done.

THE RIGHT KIND OF FEAR

The remarkable thing about fearing God is that when you fear God you fear nothing else, whereas if you do not fear God you fear everything else.

READING AHEAD

It is a good thing that we are not God; we do not have to understand God’s ways, or the suffering and brokenness and pain that sooner or later come to us all.

But we do have to know in the very depths of our being that the ultimate end of the story, no matter how many aeons it takes, is going to be all right.

SIN’S GOOD NEWS

To deny sin is bad news, indeed. The only good news is sin itself. Sin is the best news there is, the best news there could be in our predicament.

Because with sin, there’s a way out. There’s the possibility of repentance. You can’t repent of confusion or psychological flaws inflicted by your parents—you’re stuck with them. But you can repent of sin. Sin and repentance are the only grounds for hope and joy. The grounds for reconciled, joyful relationships. You can be born again.

—John Alexander in The Other Side (Jan.-Feb. 1993)

THE GREATEST DRAMA EVER STAGED

The Christian faith is the most exciting drama that ever staggered the imagination of man—and the dogma is the drama. That drama is summarized quite clearly in the creeds of the Church, and if we think it dull it is because we either have never really read those amazing documents or have recited them so often and so mechanically as to have lost all sense of their meaning. The plot pivots upon a single character, and the whole action is the answer to a single central problem: What think ye of Christ?

—Dorothy Sayers in Dorothy L. Sayers:
A Careless Rage for Life

NO PLACE FOR FAITH

At its best, our age is an age of searchers and discoverers. At its worst, it is an age that has domesticated despair and learned to live with it. The fiction that celebrates this last state will be the least likely to transcend its limitations, since, when the religious need is banished successfully, it usually atrophies, even in the novelist. The sense of mystery vanishes. A kind of reverse evolution takes place. The whole range of feeling is dulled.

—Flannery O’Connor in

FALSE GODS

The soul of the covetous is far removed from God, as far as his memory, understanding and will are concerned. He forgets God as though He were not his God, owing to the fact that he has fashioned for himself a god of Mammon and of temporal possessions.

UPDATE

Brownsville Revival Rolls Onward

But success brings intense scrutiny for Pensacola Pentecostal church.

Nearly 2 million visitors have thronged to evening services at Brownsville Assembly of God in Pensacola, Florida, since revival erupted on Father's Day in 1995.

"It's just as fresh to me today as it was two and a half years ago," says evangelist Steve Hill, who has been guest preaching at the church since then. During that span, 122,000 have signed "decision cards" indicating conversion or rededication.

A year ago, the Brownsville Revival School of Ministry opened with 120 full-time students, split evenly between revival converts and those who experienced renewal, according to Michael L. Brown, the school's dean. Brown says that by the fall 1997 semester, the school, which offers a two-year theology degree emphasizing missions and evangelism, had 511 students from 46 states.

Revival leaders also have taken their message on the road, leading two-night rallies in Dallas, Saint Louis, Toledo, Memphis, Birmingham, and Anaheim. "Our goal is to bring this revival to key cities in the U.S.," says Hill, "and these meetings are a divine opportunity for people who have been revived to bring their unsaved family members to church without going inside a church."

In the 2.4 million-member Assemblies of God (AG), revival has broken out in dozens of congregations around the country. "The impact has been powerful," says Thomas Trask, the denomination's general superintendent. "Many, many of our pastors have gone [to Brownsville] searching, looking, and believing, and they have witnessed the power of God. It has done something for their own hearts and lives."

The treks are not limited to AG churches. In fact, the Brownsville revival since Azusa Street," says Pentecostal historian Vinson Synan.

VOICES OF OPPOSITION: Not everyone is singing hallelujahs. As it has proceeded, the revival has been the subject of intense media scrutiny, some of it negative. Meanwhile, there is a heated theological debate in many circles about what is happening in Pensacola and whether it is of divine, human, or even satanic origins.

"I don't really see it as a revival at all," says Christian Research Institute's Hank Hanegraaff, who has become the most visible of Brownsville's many critics, calling it a "counterfeit revival" (CT, Aug. 11, 1997, p. 54). Hanegraaff did not mention Brownsville in his book Counterfeit Revival (Word, 1997), but he has hammered the revival in his national al's duration, the number of people it is attracting, and the ripple effect it is having in churches in the United States and around the world, are leading some to draw comparisons with historic Pentecostal revivals in the early years of the century. And in recent months, Pensacola has replaced Toronto (CT, Sept. 11, 1995, p. 23) as the hot spot for revival-seekers. "This is probably the most important revival to come out of a local church

Bible Answer Man radio broadcasts, as well as in the November-December 1997 issue of Christian Research Journal, in which he criticized the church for "serious distortions of biblical Christianity . . . an overemphasis on subjective experience . . . nonbiblical spiritual practices, Scripture twisting, and false and exaggerated claims."

In November, the Salem Radio Network invited Hanegraaff to debate school dean Brown, whose own book, Let No One Deceive You: Confronting the Critics of Revival (Destiny Image, 1997), calls Counterfeit Revival "an unscholarly, often inaccurate, highly judgmental, and at times, even slanderous work."

STEPS TOWARD RECONCILIATION:

Following the often heated debate, the two men met privately for nearly three hours. The meeting resulted in forgiveness and fellowship instead of fisticuffs, along with a commitment to continue the dialogue.

Although Hanegraaff says he had been to Brownsville four times, his December 3 visit was different. He met with Brown, Hill, and Brownsville pastor John Kilpatrick, and he even spoke to students at Brown's school, where he received a warm reception and a standing ovation. Kilpatrick has also invited Hanegraaff to preach at one of Brownsville's Sunday services, an offer Hanegraaff says he is considering.

The dialogue has not changed anyone's mind, but it has cooled some of the rhetoric. "One of the things we wanted to model was that we could discuss these things in a manner that would honor Christ instead of in a way that would drag his name through the mud," says Hanegraaff, who left Brownsville with warmer feelings toward revival leaders and at least a few reservations about his earlier denunciations. "I don't know," he told CT. "It's a difficult thing for me to try to assess on a lot of levels."

Brown says he and Hanegraaff emerged from their talks sharing common views on at least three points: "We are brothers who are going to spend eternity together; we are passionate for the fundamentals of the faith; and we want to see disciples, not just converts."

MONEY QUESTIONS: In November, the Pensacola News Journal, which had previously published dozens of mostly positive articles about the revival, ran a five-day series of 30-plus stories entitled "Brownsville Revival: The Money and the Myths." The Journal called revival-related businesses "a multimillion-dollar retail industry conducted within the walls of the church." The series raised important questions about nearly every aspect of the revival and questioned the integrity of Hill and Kilpatrick. It accused Kilpatrick of orchestrating the revival and firmly disciplining dissenters and alleged that Hill fabricated parts of his dramatic testimony.

Revival leaders say the series contained "misquotes, serious misrepresentation of facts, and misleading misquotes." They responded by issuing a six-page, 47-item rebuttal of some of the paper's charges and paying for two advertisements.

The most disturbing charges in the articles (available at the paper's Web site at: www.pensacolanewsjournal.com) involved leaders growing wealthy from millions of dollars spent by revivalgoers on books, manuals, audiotapes, videotapes, and other products. The paper reported that only Brown had appropriately paid state sales tax on his books and cassettes sold at tables inside the church, a situation revival leaders say was caused by their inability to get a definitive determination from state tax officials about what they owed. (In a December 21 article, the paper reported that the remaining three ministries had made lump-sum 1997 tax payments.)

Still, questions remain about hundreds of thousands of dollars spent on personal residences, offices, vehicles, and other expenses. The paper says that during its investigation, Hill submitted incomplete financial reports, and that Kilpatrick refused to divulge any financial data for either the church or his Feast of Fire Ministries.

AG superintendent Trask says decisions about financial disclosure are up to each congregation but adds, "My philosophy has always been openness, and I've encouraged John [Kilpatrick] to be open." Trask says finances will be a topic of discussion with Kilpatrick and Hill at an imminent meeting of a "covering committee" established to offer guidance to revival leaders.

The 43-year-old Hill claims the revival's money problems are a result of honest mistakes. "I admit that I am naïve in some areas of ministry," he says. "I'm young. I've never been thrust into an arena like this."

None of four revival-related ministries is a member of the Evangelical Council for Financial Accountability. ECFA president Paul D. Nelson, who calls the Pensacola newspaper's charges "serious" confirms that Hill's Together in the Harvest Ministries has begun the application process. Kilpatrick says his Feast of Fire Ministries will apply for membership as soon as its first audit is completed. Nelson says he has not received applications from the ministries headed by Brown and music minister Lindell Cooley.

No state or federal investigations related to finances at the church have been implemented.

REVIVAL IN THE AIR: Nothing is slowing down revival leaders in Pensacola. "This has been the greatest year of my life," Hill says.

Brown says criticism of the revival naturally accompanies the works of God. "We tend to sanctify past revivals and demonize present revivals," he says. "When a baby is being born, things are a little bloody and messy, there's a whole lot of noise, and there are a lot of doctors running around. But that doesn't mean the child isn't going to be healthy in a few days."

For Trask, the revival—with all its controversy and challenges—is a welcome alternative to the AG's plateaued membership of the late 1980s and early 1990s. "The Assemblies of God was raised up as a revival movement, but we had moved away from that," he says. "We had become content. We had become careless." In the past two years, the AG has reported significant increases in the number of conversions, water baptisms, and Spirit baptisms. Giving to foreign missions is also at an all-time annual high of $117 million.

Still, Trask's main concern is that revival leaders "don't try to perpetuate something that God wants to put a stop to," a possibility that grows with each new revival-related venture.

Moon-Related Funds Filter to Evangelicals

Affiliates of Sun Myung Moon, controversial leader of the Unification Church, have a history of supporting and courting conservative evangelicals. Now, according to published reports, financial support has been filtered to Liberty University from Moon-related enterprises. But Liberty founder Jerry Falwell told CHRISTIANITY TODAY that the source of the funds does not influence his ministry.

"If the American Atheists Society or Saddam Hussein himself ever sent an unrestricted gift to any of my ministries," Falwell says, "be assured I will operate on Billy Sunday's philosophy: The Devil's had it long enough, and quickly cash the check."

While Moon may not be the Devil, Christians contest Moon's claim that he is destined by God to complete an unfulfilled mission of Jesus. Moon claims Jesus failed as the Messiah because he did not wed and have children. The divorced 78-year-old Moon says he and his current wife, Hak Ja Han Moon, 53, are the "true parents of all humanity."

$3.5 MILLION GIFT: In November, the Los Angeles Times reported that the Women's Federation for World Peace (WFWP), which is headed by Moon's wife, contributed $3.5 million to Christian Heritage Foundation (CHF) of Virginia for "educational purposes" in 1995.

WFWP chair Susan Fefferman says Falwell spoke monthly to a group of professional women forging Japanese-American friendships. Fefferman says that in return WFWP provided scholarships for "many, many students" through the CHF. She told CT that Falwell "made it clear" that he represented CHF and the $3.5 million could be sent there on behalf of Liberty.

CHF cofounder Daniel Reber says CHF solicited funds from WFWP in 1995 to help finance missions projects, not to service the school's indebtedness. "Not one penny of the Women's Federation grant was ever used to assist Liberty in its reduction of debt," Reber told CT.

Reber and Jimmy Thomas purchased and forgave $5 million worth of debt to help Falwell's financially troubled school in Lynchburg. CHF also gave $500,000 to complete construction of the dining hall, which had been halted because of nonpayment of contractors.

Reber had worked as a fundraiser for Falwell's Old Time Gospel Hour and started CHF in 1987 with Thomas, who had been chief financial officer of Falwell's Moral Majority. Both Thomas and Reber had been on Liberty's board of directors until last year. CHF is a private, independent charitable foundation that distributes Bibles and Christian literature to Communist and Third World nations.

Meanwhile, according to a Washington Post report, another Moon-related organization, News World Communications, provided an unsecured $400,000 loan to Liberty in 1996 at 6 percent interest, significantly below market loan rates. Falwell spokesperson Mark DeMoss says Liberty did not know of the Moon connection because the loan came via a broker. DeMoss says the Moon connection is unimportant because the loan was a "business transaction."

In a related development, Liberty last month disclosed that A. L. Williams is the unnamed benefactor who provided $15 million to settle Liberty debts (CT, Dec. 8, 1997, p. 61). The announcement came in part to counter rumors that Moon had been the anonymous supporter. Williams earned millions selling term life insurance and earlier had provided most of the funds to build the school's football stadium, basketball arena, and athletic center.

NOTHING 'SINISTER': Due to ongoing financial problems (CT, Feb. 3, 1997, p. 74), Liberty had been placed on probation by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools in December 1996. SACS lifted the probation in December 1997 following the school's reduction of debt.

Falwell says there is nothing "sinister or clandestine" about CHF's contribution to the school.

"Liberty does not have firsthand knowledge of how CHF is funded, or, for that matter, the source of any Liberty donor's funds," Falwell says. "The donor's source of income is generally irrelevant to Liberty."

But Paul D. Nelson, president of the Evangelical Council for Financial Accountability, says ministry and academic boards must exercise prudence when receiving large contributions.

"Donors come from all walks of life, and it can get very fuzzy as to how the money was earned," Nelson says. In the worst-case scenario, typified by the Foundation for New Era Philanthropy scandal that involved 180 evangelical groups and schools (CT, Oct. 27, 1997, p. 86), recipients must return illegally obtained funds even if the money has already been spent.

Falwell, 64, says that he addressed several groups where Moon has been in attendance, including a Uruguay meeting in 1995. Falwell says he does not compromise truth when speaking at such meetings.

"I preach for the Moonies, for the Mormons, for the Catholics, for the Jews, for the Buddhists," Falwell told CT. "I'll preach in hell if they promise to let me out."

CONSERVATIVES ATTRACTED: Moon's attempts to build influence with conservative Christians has been ongoing for years (CT, Feb. 5, 1988, p. 46). At a 1996 conference, for example, Ralph Reed, Beverly LaHate, Gary Bauer, and Robert H. Schuller all spoke at a Moon-sponsored Family Federation for World Peace event.

"Conservatives find Moon attractive because they share many of his moral and political values," says James Beverley, theology and ethics profes-

Beverley, who has studied Moon for two decades, also notes that speakers at such events often have their trips to exotic locales fully financed in addition to receiving generous honorariums.

Frederick H. Miller, who operates True Light Educational Ministry in Shirley, New York, has documented Falwell's contacts with Moon, which he says began in 1984.

Miller, a 1989 graduate of Falwell's Liberty Home Bible Institute, says he tried to meet with Falwell for four years to urge him to dissociate himself from Moon's ventures.

Beverley agrees that speakers need to clearly distance themselves from Moon's theology when attending events his organizations sponsor. "The involvement is used by Moon and other Unification Church leaders as an endorsement that Moon is the Messiah and the returned

"I'm a minister to the heathen," Falwell told CT, citing recent appearances with Hustler publisher Larry Flynt. Government aid: Vice President Al Gore unveils a brochure designed to help parents monitor Internet use.

Profamily Groups Demand More Cyberporn Prosecutions

Government officials and online service providers announced plans at a December summit to protect children from Internet obscenity, but some conservative Christian organizations believe the gathering amounted to little more than family-values window dressing.

The three-day "Internet/Online Summit: Focus on the Children" assembled government, school, library, computer-industry, and child-advocacy group leaders in Washington, D.C. While representatives did not agree on the best way to restrict youth from viewing pornography geared to adults, Vice President Al Gore announced a "zero tolerance" policy on Internet pornography depicting children and the creation of a "tip line," where parents can report child pornography.

Online providers are supporting the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children "CyberTipLine" initiative. Parents will be able to notify authorities of incidents of child pornography and child predators in cyberspace. The line will serve as a clearinghouse for tips on enticement of children for sexual exploitation, as well as information on the possession or distribution of child pornography. The new Web site is www.missingkids.com/cybertip and the center's hotline is 1-800-843-5678.

During the Clinton administration, as the use of graphics on the Web has increased and Internet technology has developed, the number of Justice Department agents patrolling cyberspace has risen from a handful to more than 100, and FBI arrests have led to the convictions of more than 100 online child predators.

Gore also unveiled a public education campaign to teach parents how to protect children surfing the Internet. While online providers say parents have primary responsibility to monitor the computer behavior of their children, at the summit several announced pre-emptive plans in an effort to prevent government intrusion.

For example, America Online unveiled a package of initiatives to make online navigation safer for children. AOL, the largest online service in the world with 10 million subscribers, will soon feature a permanent parental controls button on the welcome screen that enables adults to lock children out of anything but approved areas, chat rooms, and Web sites. In addition, AOL will activate a button to allow members to report inappropriate chat room, e-mail, and instant-message activity immediately.

SCREENING NO PANACEA: The Vice President did not heed the requests of profamily organizations to increase government restrictions to protect children. Instead, Gore's public-education campaign will rely on parents to monitor the online behavior of their children.

However, according to a new survey by FamilyPC, few parents avail themselves of commercially available parental control software designed to combat access to pornography. The survey of 750 families whose children use the Web showed only 26 percent use some form of parental-control software—mainly controls built into their Web browsers or offered by their Internet service provider. Only 4 percent had purchased parental-control software such as Cyber Patrol, SurfWatch, or Net Nanny on their own.

With only a few mouse clicks, anyone can access one of an estimated 72,000 pornographic sites on the World Wide Web. Many of them are illegal sites because they meet the definition of hard-core obscenity, depicting such behavior as incest, bestiality, and mutilation.

Screening technology alone is inadequate, critics contend, and further legal regulation of indecent content is necessary. "No screening technology blocks all sites containing harmful sexual content," says Morality in Media (MIM) president Robert W. Peters.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE? Cathy Cleaver, legal policy director of the Family Research Council, says 70 percent of Internet access by children occurs outside the home. She says public schools and libraries—which commonly offer uncensored, unsupervised access to the Internet—must be part of the solution.

Although computer users must typically provide a credit card number before gaining unrestricted access to a commercial Web site, porn cover pages frequently offer free samples to titillate before payment. And while cyberporn providers warn viewers that they must be at least 18 or 21, there is usually no age verification process.

And the problem goes beyond purchased images. For example, unregulated news groups and unsolicited e-mail are two ways pornographers can target potential customers.

Online services claim that regulating Internet content is impossible and would run afoul of First Amendment protections. But profamily groups disagree. Cleaver blames the industry for failure to remove hard-core, "clearly obscene" pornography.

"The onus should be on the Internet service providers that knowingly permit harmful material—not the parents," MIM's Peters says.

Even though many conservative Christian groups lambasted the summit, the antiporn group Enough Is Enough helped to organize it. "This is a good first step in the very long journey toward protecting children from exploitation online," says Donna Rice Hughes, the organization's communications director. Hughes says Enough Is Enough gave Gore the "zero tolerance" idea.

Nonetheless, Enough Is Enough, along with many other profamily groups, vowed to hold law enforcement and industry service providers accountable to sure that measures introduced at the summit come to fruition.

NO PROSECUTION POLICY? As for "adult" pornography, the Supreme Court nullified the indecency provisions of the Congressional Communications Decency Act (CDA) last June. But American Family Association government affairs director Patrick A. Trueman notes that the Court left provisions restricting obscenity intact. Obscenity is defined as hard-core graphic material that is obsessed with sex, obviously offensive, and lacking in serious value. Trueman criticizes the Clinton administration for refusing to prosecute any Internet-related hard-core pornography cases since then.

"The Clinton administration has a 'no prosecution policy' for Internet obscenity crimes," Trueman says.

After CDA, Clinton reiterated that his administration is "committed to vigorous enforcement of federal prohibitions against transmission of pornography over the Internet." He first pledged to enforce vigorously federal obscenity laws during his 1992 campaign against George Bush. But Peters says that overall, federal obscenity prosecutions have fallen from a high of 78 during President Bush's first year in office to a low of 17 during the past year under Clinton. He questions whether enforcement is really a priority.

"The summit goal will not be achieved unless there is a radical change in the policy in place at the Justice Department, the FBI, and the offices of U.S. attorneys," MIM's Peters says.

Strict Antimissionary Bill Retooled

The writers of a strict antimissionary bill have backed down considerably in the face of international protest. Knesset members Nissim Zvili and Moshe Gafni have rewritten the bill, which would have outlawed the publication, distribution, or possession of "materials which could lead to a change of religion" (CT, May 19, 1997, p. 55).

The new version would make it illegal only to mail such material "without the permission of the recipient" and contains no reference to publication or possession. The bill was originally drafted in response to a nationwide mass mailing of more than a million Hebrew-language tracts by evangelist Morris Cerullo.

Zvili denies that the bill has been rewritten in response to pressure from Christian groups. "Our fight is against foreign organizations that spend millions of dollars to interfere with our way of life in Israel, not against individuals who possess such literature," says Zvili.

Yet in a December 18 interview with the Hebrew-language newspaper Ha'Aretz, Zvili admitted that he had received "thousands of letters and visitors," and that "Israeli embassies were flooded with calls and letters from around the world."

Israel's Messianic Action Committee (MAC) welcomes the bill's revision but says the new version is still discriminatory. "Any attempt to take away religious liberty or freedom of speech opens the door to further attempts later," MAC chair Baruch Maoz says. "The people behind this bill have made it very clear to us that this is just the beginning; they intend to make witnessing of any kind illegal."

David Brickner, president of Jews for Jesus, is optimistic. "It sounds like Nissim Zvili is on the run," Brickner says. He believes Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "will probably kill the bill if he can make a deal without raising a public outcry."

There are indications that a deal is in the works. The Inter-religious Coordinating Council in Israel has drawn gauge in activities alienating them from their tradition and community." Such wording might be acceptable to both sides, because Messianic Jews do not consider that they are "alienated" or attempting to alienate others from Judaism.

Zvili says that "if we could reach an agreement on a signed commitment, I am ready to drop the bill entirely."

Greg Mauro, vice president of Morris Cerullo World Evangelism Ministries, says he is grateful that the Knesset members have revised the bill because they "recognized the threat of religious censorship inherent in the first draft."

But Mauro says the revised version is "an open door to the suppression of religious liberties."

"Who is to determine whether a piece of mail 'crosses the line' and encourages one to change his or her faith?" Mauro asks. "How are organizations to 'prove' that they had the consent of the people before mailing to a home an item discussing the gospel?"

Plans Under Way for Next Day of Prayer

The November 16 International Day of Prayer (IDOP) for persecuted

Christians exceeded expectations, with 60,000 U.S. churches participating. But coordinator Steve Haas is convinced three times as many congregations will be involved this year.

"This was not a one-shot deal," Haas told CT. "Our task is not done."

Churches involved in the November 16 event conducted various activities, including marches, prayer vigils, and sermons. The movement continues to grow. On May 30, the global March for Jesus will focus on remembering the persecuted body of Christ.

Meanwhile, Haas has brought together 19 advocacy groups that previously had little contact with one another, including Open Doors with Brother Andrew, Voice of the Martyrs (VOM), Freedom House, and Christian Solidarity International.

"Our hope isn't to create a new organization but to enable these organizations to be more effective," Haas says. Although the groups have different programs, they have been reluctant to cooperate because they work with the same potential donor base.

Yet many of the organizations have benefited from the persecution issue being raised. For example, VOM experienced an 87 percent growth rate in 1997.

"Christians are a lot more sensitive about persecution now," says VOM U.S. director Tom White. "The idea of martyrs being strange has been demystified."

Haas also is trying to build bridges with secular groups, such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International, and make them more cognizant of religious persecution. Currently, some secular human-rights groups are more concerned about abortion rights and homosexual rights than freedom of religious expression.

Some liberal religious groups have accused IDOP of having political motivations as a ploy of the Religious Right, a charge Haas finds nonsensical because of the number of mainline Protestant and Catholic churches involved. Some fundamentalist churches have criticized the movement as being too liberal because Catholics participate.

"We need to stay focused on the issue of persecution, not who we're sitting next to at a planning session," Haas says. "If Catholics or Protestants want to pray for the persecuted, why should they be discouraged from doing so?"

IDOP has also been criticized by some liberals for not being concerned about persecution of Muslims and Buddhists. But Haas says the majority of Christian churches still are unaware of persecution of Christians, and that is a necessary first step in the movement. □

ven though many pastors fled the civil war that ravaged Liberia for seven years, Christian leaders believe the church is emerging stronger than before.

"Despite these difficulties brought about by the civil war, we see the church of Liberia being resurrected all over again," says Emmet Veslar Hunter of the Association of Evangelicals in Liberia. "I can foresee a better leadership emerging in the Liberian church."

George Queniseari of the Monrovia Evangelical Church says many exiles have returned to seminaries and Bible colleges. "Many others are still planning to return to the country for God's work," he says. "The gospel is needed as never before, according to Hunter. "The church is experiencing a tremendous infiltration of heresy," he says. "Most ministers of the gospel have either been killed or fled the country, so many false teachers are now taking over the churches. People are getting involved in all sorts of occult practices and immorality."

Despite these problems, Queniseari says the "fire of revival is burning" among faithful Christians who are "burning with zeal to work for God."

The civil war was the result of tribal rivalry and ethnic cleansing by major ethnic groups in the country who sought to control political power (CT, June 17, 1996, p. 60). The war resulted in the massacre of more than 150,000 people and 750,000 others losing their homes.

Some Christians were tortured and killed because of their faith. Missionaries and aid workers fled the final round of anarchy (CT, May 20, 1996, p. 78). With the recent inauguration of a new democratic government, the church in Liberia is now preoccupied with the task of helping in the reconciliation.

Unique Prison Program Serves as Boot Camp for Heaven

Unlocking the good: Bryan Todd, 22, of Houston, prays during an InnerChange class at Jester II Prison Unit.

Eighty-five Bible-toting inmates at a Texas prison are taking part in the nation's first faith-based prison prerelease program run 24 hours a day by an independent Christian organization.

The unusual experiment in church-state cooperation is the first time a state prison system has allowed a private Christian organization—Prison Fellowship International of Reston, Virginia—to take over an entire prison wing.

The goal of the round-the-clock volunteer program is to transform inmates spiritually and keep them from returning to prison.

"We want to change the inner man through the love of Jesus Christ," says pastor Don Bentley, a Prison Fellowship employee. "Until you do that, all you have is a polished-up convict."

The InnerChange Freedom Initiative—an intense blend of studying the Bible, teaching Christian values, and mentoring by church volunteers—is the first program of its kind in the United States. Houston-area church volunteers will work with inmates before and after they leave the minimum security Jester II Prison Unit between Sugar Land and Richmond southwest of Houston.

RIGOROUS SCHEDULE: Rising before dawn, the men make up their bunks inside their gray seven-foot-square cubicles. Each has a reading light. Some inmates display pictures of Jesus, crosses, or other religious symbols.

Encouraging signs are posted in different locations. "If It Is to Be, It's Up to Me," one message proclaims. Another states: "The Only Antidote to Pride Is the Grace of God."

At 5:30 A.M., inmates attend a mandatory worship service. Praying, hymnsinging, studying the Bible, learning life skills, and working at prison jobs follow. The day ends at 9 P.M.

Prison Fellowship, founded by Charles Colson, has allocated $1.2 million for the first two years to pay for programming of the pilot project and hiring of five full-time staff members. The Texas Department of Corrections is not out any extra expense, although the state provides the space, food, and guards.

Eventually, 200 inmates are to take part in the prerelease program. Groups are added in increments. Three sections have been received so far, and another group of 30 is due to join this month.

"Prison Fellowship wants to hike us up to 300 men, but the board will have to approve that," says Warden Fredrick Becker, a Methodist layman who has high hopes for the Christian effort.

The program makes efforts to teach basic virtues such as love, charity, self-sacrifice, honesty, and integrity. "Those things are just words to most of those inmates," Becker says. "They've never experienced them in their own families."

UNLOCKING THE GOOD: On a recent morning, men dressed in prison whites and many carrying Bibles sang "Victory in Jesus," then listened intently as Pastor Bentley preached from a Bible spread before him.

"Many of you are here because of pride," Bentley said. "If you are a pompous and arrogant jackass, God is going to hold you accountable."

During a midmorning Lifeskills class, Jester II prison chaplain Jerry McCarty carried on the theme.

"This is a boot camp for getting into heaven," he said. "We want to unlock the good person potentially inside you."

Brandishing a Bible above his head, McCarty declared: "This is the owners' manual. Christianity is not just for old women and little children. It's for everyone, too."

Inmates who volunteer have committed a wide range of crimes, including murder, assault, drug-trafficking, embezzlement, and hot-check writing.

"If we had only altar boys and first-time offenders it wouldn't be a true test," Becker says. "I'm glad to say that the average man in the program is a third-time offender, and some are fourth- and fifth-time offenders."

Faith-based prison programs are gaining more acceptance across America, according to Reggie Wilkinson, president of the American Correctional Association.

"The Christian programs are more prominent in the Bible Belt," says Wilkinson, director of the Ohio prison system. "But prisons everywhere are letting faith groups in because of the need for the community to be involved in rehabilitating our prison population."

CHANGES EVIDENT:

Some skeptics see the program as another version of "jailhouse religion," a term used to describe prisoners who seek easier prison time by embracing faith while behind bars, then toss their Bibles in the trash after they leave.

"A lot of people who have been in the prison system a long time just play games with religion," says Bentley. "They know what people want to hear and give it to them, but aren't really serious."

But the rigorous schedule of Christian activities weeds out those who are not serious, Bentley believes.

Patterned after methods that have sharply reduced recidivism in Brazil and Ecuador, the program aims to reduce the 48 percent return rate of convicts to Texas prisons. Statistical evidence on whether it is working will not be available for at least three years.

But the inmates, top prison officials, church volunteers of InnerChange, and veteran prison guards believe results are immediate.

"I've already seen changes in their habits and attitudes," says Sgt. Levi Peterson, 47, a prison guard for 13 years, who is not a part of the InnerChange effort. "When you get a group of inmates of different cultures and backgrounds to study together and read the Bible together, it's going to make a difference."

McCarty, the prison chaplain, concurs.

"We are stuck with anecdotal evidence now," he says. "But we see the look on their faces, the spring in their step, and the brotherhood that is forming. We see very definite changes."

ROUGH BEGINNING: Walter Kasper, an inmate convicted of drug possession who became a part of the original group of inmates in InnerChange, says things have not always been harmonious among InnerChange participants.

"We had some real bad actors in our first group," he says. "We were a hodgepodge of 37 that stepped off the bus.

in October with Colson and joined the inmate choir in singing "Amazing Grace."

Ultimately, inmates will be asked to put the brotherly love they are taught into action. At the midpoint of training they will go out into the community, build houses for the poor, and try to apologize and make restitution to those they have committed crimes against.

NO ACLU OBJECTIONS: A few groups, including Americans United for Separation of Church and State, have objected to the Christian program, saying it violates constitutional principles. But Texas leaders of the American Civil Liberties Union are not concerned.

"It follows all guidelines, and we have no problem with it," says regional ACLU director Diana Patrick of Dallas. "No one is coerced to be a part of it, and no special benefits are given."

Becker contends there is no violation because the program is entirely voluntary. Although Christian-based, it is open to all faiths. Two Muslims joined the first group, for example.

One Muslim, Joseph Williams, has converted to Christianity. But the other Muslim, Darryl Brown, continues to read the Qur'an and say Islamic prayers five times a day.

"They respect my faith," Brown says. "There are a lot of guys here who are truly sincere; and they are walking the walk and talking the talk."

About 200 volunteers are working in the program, but 350 will eventually be needed. Semiretired Houston attorney Jack Allen spends about 20 hours a week meeting with 14 inmates to evaluate their progress.

"After they get out we will continue to work with them for six months, minimum," he says. "They can come to us for help."

Allen says he cannot predict whether the program will succeed.

"We are just starting down the road," he says. "It will take more than my ability to change these folks. But if the inmates work with those trying to help them, it could be effective."

Judy Indermuehle, a real-estate agent and member of Sugar Creek Baptist Church who volunteers as a phonics teacher, had misgivings at first.

"Now I look forward to it every day," she says. "This is the church's first opportunity to affect prison life. And it's a wonderful opportunity."

By Jim Jones in Houston.

Group worship: Michael Potts, 43, of Houston, sings hymns during an InnerChange class.

Now our group is down to 20."

Many dropped out because they did not realize what a grueling schedule they would follow. Others were asked to leave because they could not adjust to the group environment and the rigid rules, Kasper says.

Texas Gov. George W. Bush strongly supports the program, one of several initiatives he has championed in which faith groups join with government agencies to help welfare reform, house the homeless, and help inmates after their release from prison.

King's College Resurrection Signals Big Apple's Renewal

The King's College, which closed more than three years ago (CT, Nov. 14, 1994, p. 66), has emerged from bankruptcy under Campus Crusade for Christ ownership and hopes to take advantage of a remarkable spiritual, social, and economic comeback in New York City by opening a campus in the Empire State Building.

The college, then in nearby Briarcliff Manor, peaked in the 1970s, but started to decline and finally collapsed into bankruptcy with more than $25 million of debt, mostly from the mortgage of a new suburban campus (CT, Dec. 12, 1993, p. 60).

But King's President Friedhelm Radandt used a marketing study to convince Stan Oakes of Campus Crusade for Christ that New York City needed a Christian college because of ongoing renewal. At the time, Oakes himself was hatching a plan for a network of colleges under Crusade's International Christian University. He needed a model college with accreditation and a headquarters.

"New York City has a growing church, a lot of optimism, and a growing unity," Oakes says. In exchange for ownership of King's and campuses in the Empire State Building and in suburban New York, Campus Crusade for Christ settled the debts. King's will retain Radandt as president but will operate as part of Crusade's International Christian University under the leadership of Oakes.

CITYWIDE RENEWAL: King's College's decline mirrored the disastrous 1960s and 1970s in New York City. Stricken by crime, economic catastrophe, and weak leadership, the city became a byword for trouble.

Radandt reflects that the larger church had also abandoned the Big Apple. "We didn't equip people in the city church at The King's College," he says. "That was a failure. God had to bring us to a point of humbleness before we could recognize it."

But the city—and its church, too—revived. Bankruptcy, job losses, and demographic flights have been replaced by budget surpluses, employment growth, and massive in-migration.

Prayer roof: Youth pray on top of a nine-story church in Chinatown.

The renewal of King's rides on an increased demand for education by a renewed New York church. Suburban Nyack College also has branched into the city. And New York has 70 Bible institutes training more than 3,000 students.

New York remains more Catholic (42 percent) than Protestant (30 percent), but the numbers do not capture the strong movement into evangelical Protestantism. A recent City University of New York (CUNY) survey indicates at least 18 percent of New Yorkers (1.3 million) belong to evangelical churches.

EVANGELICAL DIVERSITY: The New York church is also probably the most ethnically mixed in the world, reflecting the fact that 34 percent of New Yorkers are recent immigrants. Tamil, Pakistani, Indonesian, Korean, Chinese, Filipino, and Hispanic congregations have started recently in the city.

More than one-third of Hispanic church leaders in training joined their churches within the past three years, according to a Columbia University study. In one poor, south Bronx district, a new Hispanic church is founded every month.

The hopes at King's lie in students such as Caroline Miranda, who came from a drug-infested block and now directs the daily business of Operation Exodus, an educational ministry for Hispanics. She is typical of the new Hispanic Christian in the New York mix. Her parents are from El Salvador and Colombia, her church is mainly Puerto Rican, and her mentor, Operation Exodus founder Luis Iza, is Cuban. A board of directors includes immigrants from Cuba, Egypt, China, Puerto Rico, Dominican Republic—and one Mayflower descendant.

Half of the Asian immigrants in the city identify themselves as Christian, according to Andrew Beveridge of CUNY. Evangelical Koreans have started more than 350 churches and 15 colleges and seminaries in the city.

King's steering committee cochair Roderick Caesar, Jr., typifies the new African-American leadership—more evangelical, upwardly mobile, and education-minded. Caesar leads an 800-member congregation, a 400-student Bible institute, and 18 affiliated churches. He is also cochair of the local Promise Keepers. "You need to feel the power of God today," Caesar says. "Something is happening."

UNEXPECTED CONVERTS:

King's also hopes to gain support from New York's highly educated professional and creative residents who have increasingly turned to God. Two groups stand out:

Russians and young Manhattanites.

Mitch Glaser, president of Chosen People, began meeting Russian Jewish immigrants during street evangelism. "To my surprise, the first night we held a Russian Bible study, 30 people showed up," he says.

In Brooklyn, Greg Zhelezny, a young immigrant from Ukraine, led several hundred Russians, mostly Jewish, to establish a new church. "In the Soviet Union, we had been cut off from religion and our Jewish identity," Zhelezny says. "We have so much to learn."

In Manhattan, Redeemer Presbyterian Church, which specifically targets young business and creative professionals, has blossomed into an 2,100-strong church from a Bible study. More than one-third are Asian.

Success story: Miranda went through the Operation Exodus program and now works for the group.

Church founder Tim Keller speaks the language of his audience by mixing references to hip city culture, corporate anxieties, and the Bible. But Keller had been wary of coming to New York.

Samuel Ling, a Chinese-American church leader, took Keller on a tour of a Hindu temple, a high school with students from 136 nations, and upscale Fifth Avenue. Keller recalls, "I found myself becoming awed and stirred by the arrogance, fierce secularity, diversity, power, and spiritual barrenness of New York City."

Christian New Yorkers face such challenges with a new optimistic attitude. In 1957, evangelist Billy Graham faced Gotham warily "with fear and trembling" in preparing for a crusade. His return in 1991 marked a turning point in the church's visibility as 250,000 people packed Central Park in the largest religious assembly in New York City history. Today, God's good news is echoing down the alleys and the valleys of New York into God's classrooms.

JOHN W. KENNEDY

Back to school: Don Argue will become a college president again.

NAE President Argue Takes New Post

National Association of Evangelicals (NAE) president Don Argue has announced his resignation and will become president of Northwest College in Kirkland, Washington.

During his three years at the NAE helm, the Carol Stream, Illinois-based organization made strides in a number of areas, including racial reconciliation and raising the awareness of persecuted Christians.

"He has brought energy and commitment to a ministry that spoke in behalf of Christians to public issues, touched people of all ethnic backgrounds, and championed the interests of churches that are faithful to the Word of God," says NAE chair Leonard Hofman. "In advancing a network among evangelical leaders who are committed to unity in essentials and charity in all things, Dr. Argue helped NAE build a bridge toward effective ministry in the coming millennium."

The resignation is effective April 15. NAE secretary L. Edward Davis calls the decision unexpected and says the organization's 15-member executive committee is reviewing options of how to find a replacement. He says the committee will have a plan ready by the time of the March 2-4 annual convention in Orlando.

Davis says the NAE is grappling with how to redefine the role of its Washington governmental affairs office. The office has a 10-year lease that expires this summer. Another major issue facing the NAE is a joint consultation next January with the National Black Evangelical Association.

Argue, 58, has tried to revitalize NAE membership, calling it "too old, too white, and too male." In 1996, the organization issued an "Evangelical Manifesto" in an effort to stem evangelicalism's growing fragmentation.

During his tenure, Argue brought the concerns of religious freedom to a national policy level. He is cochair of the State Department's Subcommittee on Religious Freedom and Religious Persecution Abroad.

Argue will be in China February 8 to March 1 with New Jersey Roman Catholic Archbishop Theodore McCarrick and New York rabbi Arthur Schneier to meet with government officials and church leaders.

Before becoming NAE president, Argue had been president of North Central Bible College for 15 years. He succeeded the retiring Billy Melvin as NAE leader. [CT]

Gender Revisions Completed on NIV

The Colorado Springs-based International Bible Society has completed revisions to an adaptation of the New International Version (NIV) Bible. The revisions address recent concerns about gender-inclusive language.

The Bright Beginnings New International Reader's Version (NIRV) is an adaptation of the NIV for children and people for whom English is a second language.

The new NIRV text treats gender exactly as the NIV. For example, the new version says in Genesis 1:27 that God created man in his own likeness. The earlier version said God created human beings in his likeness. The IBS agreed last year to revisions following pressure from concerned groups (CT, June 16, 1997, p. 52).

A 40-member team that included professors from the Assemblies of God and the Southern Baptist Convention, two of the denominations that expressed concern about the original NIRV, tackled the gender-related revisions.

The updated version is scheduled for release in August. [CT]

SOUTHERN BAPTISTS

Split Nearing for Texas Convention

One of the country's largest Baptist bodies may split this year. A group called Southern Baptists of Texas (SBT) has announced plans to form a new state convention that would parallel the 2.7 million-member Baptist General Convention of Texas (BGCT). The purpose of a new convention, according to spokesperson Dee Slocum, would be "to ensure and maintain a strong SBC presence in Texas."

Slocum, pastor of Highland Baptist Church in Amarillo, says the BGCT has been distancing itself from the 15 million-member SBC for four years.

"We have seen an erosion of the historic walk with the SBC on the part of the elected leadership of the BGCT," he says. "That concerns Southern Baptists across Texas."

SBT members opposed recent passage of a plan by the BGCT that authorizes new ministries they say compete with those provided by the SBC's seminaries, publishing house, and mission boards. BGCT leaders say the new initiatives are necessary to reach unbelievers in their state.

The SBT's concerns, however, "are not well-founded and not justification" for creating a new state convention, says William Pinson, Jr., BGCT executive director.

A similar split occurred in 1996 among Southern Baptists in Virginia, where more than 150 SBC churches have affiliated with a new state convention. Although there are rival factions in many of the SBC's state organizations, most observers do not believe any others are near supporting additional conventions.

Creation of the new Texas convention, which could happen before summer, will force SBC churches to decide to stay with the BGCT, affiliate with the new convention, or, perhaps, become dually aligned.

Tin Drum Oklahoma Clash Marches On

A federal judge ruled December 24 that Oklahoma City police unconstitutionally seized copies of The Tin Drum last summer, but the fracas over the 1979 film promises to continue for several months. The German movie, which won the 1979 Academy Award as Best Foreign Language Film, implies, but does not show, a boy engaging in oral sex with a 16-year-old girl. Conservatives say that under state law, a film does not have to be explicit to be child pornography. Even suggesting sex with a minor is illegal. Last May, a Minnesota judge dismissed a suit brought against Bethel College by a former student who claimed that use of The Tin Drum in classroom study violated the school's promise not to use pornography (CT, June 16, 1997, p. 71). Bob Anderson, executive director of Oklahomaans for Children and Families, heard a radio discussion about the Bethel suit and investigated the film's availability in his city. He showed the sexual scenes of the movie to police, who turned to U.S. District Judge Richard C. Freeman. Freeman ruled a scene legally obscene. Police seized copies of the film from libraries and video outlets, then asked video-store owners for the names of residents who had rented the film. One patron, Michael Camfield, development director for the Oklahoma American Civil Liberties Union, then sued police and Oklahoma City District Attorney Bob Macy for illegal seizure.

"The police probably were overaggressive," Anderson says, "but as a community group, it is our duty to show the police illegal materials like this." A ruling on whether the movie is child pornography will be decided in later civil suits.

Man Objecting to Foster Parents Fired

Larry Phillips contends that he was verbally assaulted, mocked, harassed, and eventually fired by his Missouri Division of Family Services supervisors because of his objections to the placement of children in homes of homosexual foster parents. In April 1995, Phillips, who was a social worker at the Division of Family Services from March 1994 to November 1996, questioned the placement of a child with a lesbian parent. He says his supervisor told him he "was being intolerant" and his religious beliefs "were affecting his ability to perform his job effectively." But Phillips, of Kansas City, is fighting back with a lawsuit. He is seeking damages from the state of Missouri for wrongful termination. Missouri Department of Social Services spokesperson Debbie Hendricks says the agency "does not license openly homosexual couples to be foster parents." But she says prospective single parents are not asked about their sexual orientation. Currently about 25 states allow adoption by one homosexual parent. In December, New Jersey became the first state to allow an adoption by a homosexual couple. [CT]

PERU

Imprisoned Evangelicals Dispute Accusations of Terrorism

About 80 Peruvian evangelicals claim they have been falsely convicted in the government's haste to break the back of terrorism.

Wuille Ruiz Figueroa's day in court before a ski-masked judge did not come until six months after antiterrorist police arrested him. The state produced no evidence against the Methodist lawyer, who worked as a counselor for incarcerated women. He pleaded innocent to charges of possessing subversive propaganda, but Peru's law against terrorism restricted his defense. In 1993, the judge found Ruiz, now 38, guilty. Peru's Supreme Court reaffirmed the 20-year sentence.

Ruiz's case is typical of the plight of evangelicals in Peru, who consider themselves victimized by antiterrorism laws. The case reminds lawyer Alfonso Wieland of the church's continuing need for a legal team to defend human rights. Wieland, 34-year-old executive director of the Peace and Hope Association, estimates that as many as a quarter of the approximately 4,000 people convicted of terrorism are innocent, among them some 80 evangelicals.

Since 1980, in its quest to impose communism, the Maoist Shining Path insurrectionist movement has been responsible for the deaths of more than 30,000 people in Peru. The terrorists often razed entire villages in poor rural areas populated by evangelicals. Nearly 90 percent of the country claims affiliation with the Roman Catholic Church.

TERRORIST EVANGELICALS? In 1984, leaders of Peru's evangelical alliance, CONEP, responded to the widespread suffering by founding the Peace and Hope Association as the alliance's social relief arm, providing emergency food, clothing, and legal help to hundreds of displaced Peruvians.

Concurrent with guerrilla violence, the army massacred hundreds of civilians suspected as terrorists. Those who treat the wounded, feed the hungry, and give shelter to individuals needing a bed—actions that evangelicals consider their Christian duty—violate laws against "terrorist collaboration." A repentance law, which offers plea bargains to accused terrorists if they identify other terrorists, invites enemies of evangelicals to implicate them—with no questions asked.

President Alberto Fujimori's strong-arm tactics to end the siege included the Case study: Attorneys Alfonso Wieland (left) and German Vargas review a file of one of the imprisoned Christians they are defending.

1992 establishment of special antiterrorism tribunals. Wieland says that Ruiz's case typifies the justice these courts deliver. Some say the conviction rate is as high as 97 percent. Sentences range from 20 years to life.

MINISTERING TO EVANGELICALS:

In 1995, with no other evangelical organization fighting for human rights, Peace and Hope narrowed its focus to legal counsel and prison ministry. Today its staff of five lawyers and a social worker, plus a network of pastors and lay volunteers from ten denominations, provide legal and spiritual support for evangelicals, both in the courtroom and in the prisons. Last year, Peace and Hope secured pardons or acquittals for 15 prisoners. High-profile defendants that Peace and Hope lawyers have represented include Juan Mallea, a taxi driver accused of 10 murders and freed in 1994 (CT, April 25, 1994, p. 46).

The government's measures, however ruthless, ultimately worked. With Shining Path and the smaller but equally violent Tupac Amaru Revolutionary Movement largely crushed, terrorism no longer poses a daily threat to Peruvians. Peru is thriving as foreign investors are rebuilding what had been destroyed. While some observers maintain that Shining Path's threat justified sweeping government action to stop the guerrillas' wave of murder and sabotage, Peace and Hope lawyer German Vargas criticizes indiscriminate killings of civilians who happened to live in an area with a reported Shining Path presence. "To think that to defeat terrorism it's not important how many innocent people might fall is the same logic Shining Path uses to justify its terrorist actions," Vargas says.

Wieland agrees that the government used unnecessary measures, including the "faceless" terrorism tribunals that served no practical purpose after the 1992 capture of Shining Path leader Abimael Guzman. Ski masks and one-way mirrors concealed judges' identities in an effort to avert reprisals.

STILL BEHIND BARS: A morning in Castro Castro maximum security prison in Lima's fringe is a stark reminder that Christians still are paying a long-term price for the government's overzealous pursuit of suspected revolutionaries. Thirty Peace and Hope workers frequent the prisons. The group sponsors craft and writing contests to encourage creativity amid the monotony of incarceration.

While Peace and Hope ministers to the spiritual and social needs of all prisoners, it offers legal assistance only to evangelicals whose cases its lawyers research and conclude to have been wrongfully convicted. Many whom Peace and Hope defends are evangelicals who converted through the thriving prison fellowship, supported by the organization but led by inmates themselves.

The past year has brought reforms that encourage Wieland, including the end of "faceless" judges. In August 1996, Peru's congress unanimously created the "Ad Hoc Commission" to review questionable convictions. It recommends pardons to those convicted with insufficient evidence. Of the 2,375 cases submitted for review, the commission has heard approximately one-third and recommended 310 for final presidential approval. This commission considered Ruiz's case in November. But a ruling could take months.

Peace and Hope lawyers contend these reforms do not go far enough. "The legislation that permitted these severe punishments in the first place is still in place," Vargas says. "Torture is an ordinary matter of course." Despite constitutional guarantees that the accused is innocent until proven guilty, terrorism trials reflect the facts of reality, he says. And since the Ad Hoc Commission does not overturn sentences but rather commutes them, terrorism still mars the records of those it frees.

While Ruiz awaits the commission's decision on his case, he writes devotionals and leads the Christian community in cellblock 1B of Castro Castro. He dreams of his wife, Silvia, and 5-year-old daughter, Esteli, neither of whom he may see much. And he prays.

The most expensive Hollywood motion picture ever produced has just been released to theatres worldwide. Audiences by the millions are streaming in to see the story of the Titanic, the "unsinkable" luxury ocean liner that plunged 2 miles to the ocean floor on its maiden voyage, taking 1522 lives with it.

But there's MORE. MUCH MORE! Stand by the richest man in the world, Colonel John Jacob Astor, who was not allowed into a lifeboat. His wealth could not buy his survival. Did he hear John Harper's earnest pleas to trust in Jesus Christ? Or did he go to the bottom of the Atlantic not knowing? The story is so dramatic that Moody Adams has created a stunning new book so that the entire Christian world would be inspired by it!

And this book delivers! It tells the story of one man who played the role of a hero in those fateful and final moments. John Harper is memorialized for his devotion to Jesus Christ and the earnestness of his life in service to the Gospel.

MOODY ADAMS

"In 1997, I was in Harper Memorial Baptist Church in Glasgow. My personal experience with John Harper's heroic story on the Titanic made me determined to pass it on to as many people as possible in the Christian world. This inspiring, incredible story is as dramatic as it can get!"

HOLLYWOOD JUST SPENT $200 MILLION, BUT DID NOT TELL US THE REAL STORY!

Now, read a fantastic TRUE account of those last few agonizing moments!

There is COURAGEOUS HEROISM and unshakable faith which inspire all who know the full story, which has remained hidden, but now finally REVEALED!

This story about John Harper provides a life-changing, heart-warming, and breathtaking account never before published in the U.S.

Growing Criticism

Groups back away from Preparation for Parenting.

The Chatsworth, California-based organization Growing Families International (GFI) claims that more than 3,500 churches worldwide use GFI-published resources for guidance on child rearing. But despite such apparent popularity, the list of critics of GFI—and of its executive director, Gary Ezzo—continues to expand.

More than four years ago, CHRISTIANITY TODAY reported on questions being raised about the parenting advice offered in Preparation for Parenting, coauthored by Ezzo and his wife, Anne Marie, and On

Becoming BABYWISE, a secularized version containing the same concepts but without religious references (CT, Aug. 16, 1993, p. 34.)

At that time, Ezzo served on the staff at Grace Community Church in Sun Valley, California. Recently, however, the church's board of elders issued a public statement disavowing any affiliation with GFI and outlining "serious concerns" about the organization and its teachings, as well as concerns about accountability.

UNCONVENTIONAL MEDICAL WISDOM: Critics maintain generally that the Ezzos advocate a style of parenting that overemphasizes control and discipline at the expense of parental intuition and compassion. They say the medical advice offered or implied by GFI materials runs counter to current medical wisdom.

In a Web site, the Ezzos have claimed GFI is supported by "a network of health care professionals" that includes "hundreds of pediatricians." GFI has not documented the claim.

Says Kathy Nesper, president of the Artesia, California-based Apple Tree Family Ministries, "I don't know who their doctors are, but I'm not aware of a single International Board Certified Lactation Consultant (IBCLC) who has publicly supported their program."

Calls from pediatricians and emergency-room physicians prompted the Child Abuse Prevention Council of Orange County to conduct an extensive study of GFI materials. Physicians had been reporting a high incidence of dehydrated and failure-to-thrive children whose parents were adhering strictly to the Ezzos' program.

Colleen Weeks cochaired the committee, which conducted a detailed investigation of GFI materials spanning a year and a half before releasing results in 1996. Weeks says, "We established six criteria for healthy parenting education, and our committee concluded that [the GFI materials] met none of those standards."

GOD'S ONLY PARENTING PLAN? What complicates matters, according to critics, is that GFI represents its principles as being the only biblically prescribed approach to parenting. GFI materials acknowledge that the Bible is silent on such issues as infant feeding. But Nesper, whose ministry specializes in childbirth:

education and family life education or young Christian couples, says, "The underlying message is that their way is God's way."

The Grace Community Church statement supports Nesper's assessment. "Portraying scheduled feeding is the true biblical practice, GFI strongly implies that demand feeding should be regarded as an unbiblical, humanistic—even sinful—approach to caring for infants. As elders, we see no biblical basis for dogmatism on this issue."

Phil R. Johnson, an elder at Grace Church and the statement's main author, says the Ezzos "built their program on credibility they borrowed from Grace Church." Johnson says that a "case could also be made to suggest that those of us with serious concerns about Gary's character should have pursued the discipline process more aggressively."

A CHORUS OF CRITICS: Focus on the Family cites the Ezzos' "misuse of biblical texts" as a "cause for serious concern." Focus points out that the Ezzos repeatedly cite Matthew 27:46 (where Jesus cries out from the cross "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?") in support of their teaching that mothers should refuse to attend to crying infants who have already been fed, changed, and had their basic needs met. Focus says, "We see no way to make such an application of this verse without completely disregarding its original context and purpose."

The American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) may join the GFI critics. A resolution proposing that the AAP comment publicly on GFI materials is before the organization's southeast region. If approved, similar action is likely to follow at the AAP's annual meeting this fall.

INHIBITING EMOTIONAL DEVELOPMENT? While many have focused their critique of GFI on the potential health dangers to infants, others have raised concerns about possible negative psychological and spiritual effects on children's development. In November, marriage and family counselor Barbara Francis focused on the GFI parenting program in a seminar at the annual meeting of the American Association of Christian Counselors.

"The GFI model does not acknowledge God-designed levels of human development," says Francis, adding that she is uncomfortable with the Ezzos' advice to allow a baby to cry unattended.

Francis stressed the importance of two- and three-year-old children being given the space to develop a "sense of self." Noting that, according to the Ezzos, no is not permitted, Francis says, "If a child can never say no, that child will not develop a sense of autonomy." While "Ezzo children" may be more obedient, Francis says, that obedience will likely be rooted in "fear of abandonment or punishment rather than in love."

Growing resources: The Ezzos have written three parenting programs.

DEFENDING THE PROGRAM: Those in a position to receive inquiries about GFI agree that its materials are extremely popular and that its parenting philosophy has developed a following that reaches far beyond the influence of Grace Community Church. Critics acknowledge that amid the ideas they consider misleading or dangerous can be found much sound advice and many helpful ideas.

GFI's Web site includes testimonies and newspaper articles featuring people whose family lives have improved as a result of GFI's parenting curriculum Growing Kids God's Way. Articles point out that the curriculum provides practical advice to help children learn to respect their parents and to put others' needs before their own. For example, it suggests that children not be allowed to begin eating dinner until whoever prepared the meal sits down.

GFI's lengthy response to the Grace Community Church statement can also be found at its Web site (www.gfi.org). According to that response, the Ezzos are "deeply disappointed" by Grace's decision to issue the statement. Among other things, GFI claims that for the 30 months previous to the statement, no member of Grace Church "pursued the Ezzos on any church-related issue." Johnson refutes this claim and several others made by GFI.

Beyond referring to its Web site, GFI declined to respond to written questions.

Potential Leaders

We all know them. Young men and women who, with the proper training, could be used powerfully by God to influence their generation.

We know, too, that their college or seminary choices can determine whether that potential will be realized or wasted.

Please take a moment to fill out the mail-in card adjacent to page 96 to receive more information for yourself or your church library. Or give the card to someone who needs practical help in making this crucial decision.

These days, to remain effective in ministry you must be committed to continuing education.

Grace Theological Seminary is committed to serving the church by providing continuing education for pastors and missionaries that is biblically sound, culturally relevant, and personally stimulating.

Grace Seminary's Doctor of Ministry degree is an advanced, accredited degree designed to help ministry professionals become more confirmed in the faith, more relevant for contemporary ministry, and more developed as individuals. Leading ministry experts such as Kent Hughes, Knute Larson, H.B. London, Gary McIntosh, and Donald Sunukian instruct the classes. Doctor of Ministry degrees are offered in both Pastoral Studies and Intercultural Ministries. Courses in the program are scheduled as week long seminars to make attendance possible for nonresidential students. Cost for the program is affordable as Grace Theological Seminary's tuition rate falls in the lower third of other leading seminaries.

Kevin and Carol Hinman believe that family life and ministry go hand in hand. That's why Regent School of Divinity was their seminary choice. Their Regent training deepened their commitment to family and to leadership training at home and overseas. Now they conduct pastors' training conferences across the globe, and translate leadership training materials into other languages.

If you and your family are called to missions, pastoral ministry, or are simply eager to serve the Lord, Regent School of Divinity is your seminary choice, too! And our field-based program may be the perfect fit for your schedule.

Vocation ^{or} Occupation?

Alumni, teachers, pastors, and others offer wise counsel on how you can get the most from your seminary or graduate school experience.

"SHOULD I pursue a seminary or graduate school degree?" And if I do, "Which program and which school are best for me?" "What must I do to get the most out of my seminary education?" and "How shall I prepare myself prior to enrollment?"

If you are seriously considering advanced study and looking toward future ministry, these are questions that you must grapple with. Last year alone over 13,000 students began seminary studies, and thousands more entered graduate schools to pursue degrees in biblical studies, theology, and ministry-related subjects. For most, their matriculation was preceded by an extended period of reflection, decision-making, and preparation.

We asked new seminary and graduate-school students, alumni, teachers, administrators, pastors, and other seminary advocates the questions above. And while their answers reflected the diversity of both students and their seminaries, many common themes and a tenor of excitement emerged in the responses. There is an upbeat sense that God has led these students and is sustaining them in their decision to prepare for ministry.

1. What factors should a person consider in determining whether to pursue a degree at a seminary or graduate school?

Many students acknowledge that they began their seminary or graduate studies without clear definition in their own call to a particular form of ministry. Still, most have felt a general sense of vocational call and were faithful in taking the first step to pursue further education and training. They saw their decision to enroll as an act of obedience to God's purpose for their individual lives.

"We are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works that God prepared beforehand for us to do" (Eph. 2:10), wrote the apostle Paul, reminding the Ephesians that, while God had saved them by grace through faith — that their salvation was not a result of any achievement on their part (vv. 8–9)— individual Christians are called to particular ministries that God has specifically designed for them.

One ramification of being "God's workmanship" is the honest recognition that we are works in progress. Scripture calls us to see ourselves realistically in terms of our gifts, passions, and callings (Rom. 12:3). We are fallen, flawed, and deficient persons, yet God has chosen to invest in us. Though flawed, we still must learn through experience and develop skills.

The school you attend will significantly affect, and even shape, the growing clarity and definition of your call (vocation) and career (occupation).

To make a wise decision about your selection of a seminary or graduate school you need to understand the broad outlines of your interests, strengths, and yearnings. This calls for discernment and realistic self-awareness. Before even requesting catalogs and application forms, do some self-assessment to help you determine the direction of your educational agenda. This will enable you to evaluate quality and "fit" of the different educational programs you investigate.

Five decision-making steps

First, seek to discover the characteristics of your "servant profile." Jesus, our model for ministry, came as a servant to seek and save the lost (Matt. 20:28; Luke 19:10). The apostle Paul, though himself admirably prepared for ministry, saw God as more interested in the development of servants willing to suffer for the gospel (2 Tim. 1:8) than in their pursuit of educational pedigrees (1 Cor. 1:20). You are a work in progress. God wants to mold and shape your unique combination of life experiences, spiritual gifts, natural talents, personality, temperament, learning styles, values, and passions so that you may "attain the whole measure of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4:13).

Consider what kinds of vocational ministry niches may best correlate with your inventory of personal characteristics. What ministry experiences have you had? Which were most satisfying? Ask godly, insightful people who know you well to help

Put Your Financial House in Order

GRADUATES of Bethel Seminary who return to visit the campus often seek out Gunnar Kronholm, an energetic, 85-year-old retired bank president. Why? Because many alumni believe he was just as important to their preparation for and success in ministry as the faculty members who taught them.

Over four decades as a bank officer, Kronholm provided loans to hundreds of seminary students and counseled many more regarding church business management, their personal finances, and biblical principles of stewardship. In the 15 years since his "retirement," Kronholm has been a special assistant to Bethel's president, generating contributions to replenish scholarship funds. He continues to give wise guidance to students about their finances and their budgetary and spending practices.

"I have been friends with seminary students for 50 years or more," says Kronholm, "and they have always had financial needs and struggles." Today's students, however, "are more diverse and lead more complex lives, making it more important that they begin their financial preparation for seminary or graduate study much earlier — well before they enroll for study." Here is some of the wisdom and insight Kronholm offers to seminary and graduate students and alumni.

Some important principles

Adopt a standard of living no higher than you will be afforded once you have entered ministry or mission service. Because many current seminary students have worked at jobs or professions for a decade or more between college and seminary, often they have become accustomed to a consumer lifestyle that is difficult to sustain while going to seminary. Spouses and the families of students may need to share an adjustment to less-spacious living quarters, fewer consumer luxuries, tighter personal budgets, and, at times, even the "psychic" loss of economic freedom and prestige. "It is wise for the prospective seminarian to learn early the disciplines of deferred gratification," counsels Kronholm.

Establish a budget and follow it. Viewed positively as a plan of action rather than as a negative limitation, a budget should enable the prospective seminary student to enjoy and protect what he or she values most. Moreover, a budget is liberating," says Kronholm, and an expression of one's commitments and priorities." Recognizing that many seminary students are married and parents, he recommends shared decision-making and regular, open communication between spouses on financial matters. Ticking off a list of items to be included in the student's budget, including adequate health insurance and, if married, low-cost term life insurance, Kronholm adds, with a twinkle in his eye, that a small amount of "foolish money" should be included to allow the seminary student and spouse to get out of the house for a few hours of special time together every week—"just the two of them."

As a banker, Kronholm was in the business of making loans, but he tells future students emphatically, "Eliminate your debt and guard a good credit history." College debt can often be deferred, but he recommends that it be eliminated before seminary study is begun. Consumer loans, even those for new autos, and especially credit-card debts, should not be brought to seminary. Home mortgage debt, if carefully set within time-tested ratios, may be acceptable, but limits should be discussed with a sympathetic financial professional. "Always be on a first-name basis with your banker, and ask for help before you are in serious financial trouble."

Kronholm is proud that none of the hundreds of seminary students to whom he made loans ever defaulted on their obligations. "Establish a good credit rating, and guard it always," he directs. Mission agencies are unable to appoint candidates with significant indebtedness, and churches often check the credit ratings of pastoral candidates and eliminate those with troubled financial histories.

Asked to summarize, Kronholm says,

"It boils down to one thing: Understand and practice biblical stewardship." He doesn't want anyone even to consider seminary study or ministry until they see themselves as "trustees," responsible to manage wisely assets and earnings belonging to the Lord and entrusted to them to use for his purposes. Time and abilities, too, are "loaned" to us to do his work. Possessions must be held lightly and cared for well. Lifestyle standards and expenditures must be consistent with biblical stewardship. Tithing should be practiced even during student years.

The earliest generation of seminary students who turned to banker Kronholm for loans and counsel are themselves entering retirement. Most, having followed his principles, do so with adequate resources and gratitude. Kronholm, on the other hand, recently renewed his appointment and looks forward to working with the next class of incoming seminarians. □

So who says there's nothing new under the sun?

At Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, we will always offer the traditional programs of study in preparation for ministry and all forms of church service. But we believe our mission is to provide the education and skills needed by the church and its leadership in each new age. So in addition to our evening programs, our dual degrees, our M.Div., M.A., S.T.M. and D.Min. studies, we continue to develop new programs and continuing education opportunities including:

Certificate program in Spiritual Formation
Summer Youth Institute for high school seniors
Training with judicatories for lay pastors
New programs in religion and health
Undergraduate Degree Completion Program offered with Geneva College Weekend Intensive courses
Creation of a World Mission Initiative

envision ministry situations in which you would be both effective and fulfilled (1Tim. 4:14). Also consider talking to a professional vocational counselor, and take a career assessment package such as IDAK Career Match or the Campbell Interests & Skills Survey.

Second, recognize that ministry is relationally intensive and requires both physical and emotional stamina. The stress of ministry often accentuates any dysfunctional dimensions of a person's personality. Careful and candid reflection on your own emotional health and relational skills is important. And though many students report personal growth, inner healing, and profound renewal of soul during seminary years, this is by no means always the case.

Furthermore, faltering marriages are not likely to be saved by enrolling in seminary: Failed marriages, like failed careers, may be transcended by the grace of God—but don't expect seminary to be a "quick fix" or a panacea for lingering defeats and hurts. It is not wise to enter any graduate program in search of recovery, therapy, healing, or acceptance. Graduate and professional schools, including seminaries, rarely see therapy as a priority (though some have resources that can assist in this form of growth and healing).

You can constructively use a time of "waiting" before enrollment to gain experience in church life, to expand your knowledge of Scripture, and to cultivate spiritual disciplines.

Third, consider whether postcollege preparation is necessary for the form of ministry toward which you feel drawn. Not all types of vocational ministry require graduate-level preparation. Bivocational ministry options, which often don't require a seminary degree, present exciting alternatives for some people. Bear in mind that seminaries and graduate schools require a baccalaureate degree, preferably with strong liberal arts components, from an accredited college. If there are possible deficiencies in your academic preparation, ask the admissions department of one or more seminaries about how you may address these. Also, learn to use the tools of educational technology, including personal computers and word processing.

Fourth, if you have a family, include your spouse and children in these deliberations. They will be significantly affected by the decision you make to enter seminary or graduate school. It is important that your entire family be in agreement and committed to the demands of what we mean by what we say

Explicitly evangelical. From the founding of Samford University's Beeson Divinity School in 1988, we have used these words to describe what we believe, under God, our school is about.

THEOLOGICAL INTEGRITY. In an age of relativism and secularism, we do not declare theological neutrality. We affirm without reservation the total truthfulness of Holy Scripture and the great principles of historic Christian orthodoxy. On these central values of the gospel we cannot and we will not compromise. We believe that theology is best done in a community of love and trust, so we pledge to nurture one another toward full maturity in Christ.

MISSIONS AND EVANGELISM. Evangelicals are "Great Commission" Christians who are determined to share the good news of Jesus Christ. At Beeson we believe this missionary mandate should inform every aspect of a theological education. We also know that we cannot share what we have not received, and so we commit ourselves to a pattern of theological training which emphasizes the disciplines of the Christian faith, a life of prayer and worship, witness and discipleship, and social compassion with justice and peace.

CHRISTIAN UNITY. Although our school is related in a special way to the Baptist tradition, we belong to a wider community of Bible-believing Christians, a fellowship in Christ which transcends the boundaries of denominational divergence. It is imperative for Christians who believe the gospel to stand and work together in the name of the one Lord whom we worship and serve.

May God help us to be faithful to these marks of evangelical identity as we seek to build the kind of school which will honor the Lord Jesus Christ and serve the upbuilding of His church.

Soli Deo Gloria!

student life for the duration of your study years.

Fifth, don't neglect the related issue of timing. Moses knew at age 40 that God wanted him to rescue the Israelites from slavery in Egypt, and he impulsively took matters into his own hands. It wasn't until Moses was 80 that God was ready to empower his vocational vision. Perhaps you sense a call to ministry but, with further reflection, recognize that the time is not yet right for enrollment in theological education. Family considerations and financial obligations are among the most important timing factors. (See "Put Your Financial House in Order," p. 114.) Some seminaries will grant you early admission and then take you "under care" until a deferred matriculation date. You can constructively use a time of "waiting" before enrollment to gain experience in church life, to expand your knowledge of Scripture, and to cultivate spiritual disciplines.

Sometimes, however, you may be aware of a call to ministry but may delay acting on it because you are not yet willing to make the sacrifices and commitments necessary for formal study. It's important that you don't enroll until you've worked through your ambivalence.

This process, when deciding to seek admission to a seminary or graduate school of religion, should result in a sense of confidence and reassurance regarding God's gracious ways. It should help you to realize that he will make provisions for you to live out his intentions joyfully. Discerning his call and deciding to prepare for his service should be an act of worship.

How do I determine the best seminary or graduate school program for me to attend?

Considering this question, a wise seminary administrator offered this advice: "Choose a school that will take you as you are but won't let you remain that way." (Continued on page 121)

Practice where you'll preach.

Fulfilling your call to the ordained ministry requires an in-depth understanding of the Christian faith and practical experience in the ministry.

Perkins School of Theology offers several degree programs to prepare you for effective Christian leadership.

Each combines the strong academic resources of Southern Methodist University with the challenge of practical experience, giving you the skills to put your faith to work. As a part of your classroom studies, you will have the opportunity to take part in a supervised internship designed especially for you. Full-time or concurrent placements are available in local congregations, institutional chaplaincies, or special ministries within church agencies.

The Perkins experience is a period of intense engagement and critical reflection. You will grow spiritually and gain valuable insights into the traditions and practice of the Christian faith.

Our Christ-centered

Personal growth exceeds skill

It is dangerous to think narrowly in terms of knowledge to be gained and skills to be mastered in seminary. You must also seek personal growth and transformation. Christian ministry, in a multitude of varied forms and venues, requires leaders who are grounded in a thorough understanding of Scripture and theology, who demonstrate competence in the necessary functions of ministry, and who exemplify growing spiritual maturity. This spiritual formation must include personal holiness, integrity and fidelity, wisdom, love, and emotional and psychological wholeness, and the fruit of the Spirit. Seek a seminary that actively and intentionally pursues its entire academic and developmental agenda. Ministry preparation must be both informational and transformational. Select a place of study that will seek to change and transform you in the midst of its academic demands.

To share the gospel of Christ in culturally relevant ways in a world of rapid change, you must learn how to adapt purposefully—or risk obsolescence. An education that is, for the most part, positioned defensively will not be adequate. The authority of Scripture and the truth of the gospel are so powerful that ministry preparation should enable you to confront and engage secular society and conflicting religious ideologies with confidence. Seminary classes ought to equip you to respond helpfully to exponential societal changes, to challenge the widespread capitulation to relative notions of truth, to address personal and spiritual brokenness, and to live up to the multiple demands for excellence in character and leadership. Consider carefully how the schools you are considering describe their mission, and seek to determine how consistently they seek to realize it.

Search for a school that will both enhance your strengths and teach you how to compensate for your weaknesses. For instance, if you have leadership skills and high academic aspirations, these are strengths to be nurtured and

'CASE THE JOINT'

JUST as a robber cases a bank before he proceeds to do a stick-up, so a prospective seminary student is well advised to size up a school carefully before deciding to enroll there.

Read the catalog and brochures, of course, and view the audiovisual recruitment presentations. Most schools now also maintain an Internet Web page, which should be consulted. If at all possible, visit the campus of your school of choice. Schedule appointments with the admissions and financial-aid officers, and meet with several faculty members. Get permission to attend several classes. Join in a chapel service.

But in addition, you need to "case the joint" too. Make a "stealth" visit to the school unannounced and unscheduled. There is another whole set of questions, the answers to which will reveal a great deal. For example, are you greeted courteously and assisted warmly? Is it easy, as a stranger, to engage people who regularly inhabit the campus?

Where's the action?

Watch where students congregate when they're not in class. Is it the coffee shop? Library? Parking lot? Do they linger after class? What is the quality of interaction among students and between students and faculty members? Eavesdrop—or if possible, try to join in their conversations. What is being discussed? Is there laughter? What can you infer about relationships among the people on campus? How might you "fit in"?

How diverse is the seminary community? What age groups are represented? Gender distribution? Ethnic and racial makeup of the community? How are the differences acknowledged? Are there signs of tension or harmony? Do you detect cliques?

How does the seminary community worship? What is chapel like? Who attends? Are there active small groups and prayer cells? How do students describe their participation in local churches? Visit one or more of these churches if you can.

Scan the formal and informal bulletin boards and postings. What kinds of cultural opportunities are available? What social and recreational activities are announced? (At one school a football pool operates under the title "Prophecy League.") If there is a student publication, scour several back issues to see the topics that students are discussing. Ask about the role of student government. Look for a "Beef Board." Even check for graffiti!

Drop by the alumni office to see how well connected the school seeks to be with its graduates. Can they identify for you recent graduates in your home territory? Try to contact these graduates to gather their perceptions of the school.

Hang around the library. How much activity is there? Does it appear to be a "user-friendly" place? Is there evidence of substantial usage and circulation? Are students borrowing and returning a significant number of books? Are there daily newspapers and newsmagazines, and are they widely read? Does the library staff appear to exercise a teaching function as well as a custodial role for the collection?

While you are in the library, look for a copy of the school's most recent self-study report to its accrediting bodies,

So... you've received a call to ministry.

NOW WHAT??

Of course you want practical "hands-on" ministry training. You also want to study under well known faculty at an accredited seminary.

What you don't want is an ivory academic tower where the name of Jesus Christ is seldom mentioned. You want to meet Christ-centered students in an environment where you can grow personally and spiritually as well as intellectually.

At Northern Baptist Seminary, we won't break your heart for ministry!

NORTHERN

baptist theological Seminary offers M.A., M.Div. and D.Min. degrees

Both regional agencies and the Association of Theological Schools.

If the school is part of a larger institution or is a member of a consortium of theological schools, can students cross register? Is there a library exchange that makes additional volumes from other schools readily available to students? Visit one or more of these consortium partner schools and inquire about how the institution you are visiting is perceived on other campuses.

Families, singles, and others

Does the seminary or graduate school appear to be "family-friendly?" Is there an indication that spouses are included and supported by the institution? Are there work opportunities or placement services available to spouses? Are there provisions made for students' children? Day care? Play areas? Is there a variety of housing available, and is it affordable? What educational arrangements are made for school-age children?

Are the needs and interests of single students given attention, too? What about international students as well as nontraditional students? Is there a well-planned roster of services for all these groups? Is it easy to determine where one can turn for help and support on the campus?

What about the campus itself? Are the facilities clean and well maintained? Are there signs of vandalism or poor upkeep? Is there substantial deferred maintenance? Are signs clear and helpful? Are there security and safety concerns?

What others say

You have not finished "casing" the school until you talk with some people who observe the campus and students from nearby vantage points. Drop by the local fast food outlet, gas station, bank, and market. What is their opinion of the school and how do they reflect on the students and faculty whom they know? Do they employ seminary students and spouses? What have they heard about student satisfaction with the school?

"Schmooze" informally with secretaries, janitors, and maintenance people, too. They are usually very knowledgeable and candid. Besides, they make valued contributions to the quality of seminary life and programs, and they often exercise the gift of encouragement to students.

The point of all this is to get a good grasp on the ethos of your preferred institution and to sense the quality and rhythm of life on the campus. It is important to gain this level of familiarity with the school, if possible, in order to envision how you would function within that learning community. This intimate knowledge of the campus will help you prepare for enrollment and enhance your growth and learning.

The selection of a seminary or graduate school is a major life decision. You cannot be overinformed in making your choice. So "case the joint!" □ that prevent burnout. God must be the ultimate sovereign of your life.

In choosing a seminary or graduate school, consider the qualifications, credentials, and credibility of an institution's faculty members. Look for gifted, godly scholars who are publishing and up-to-date in their disciplines. A cross section of those who have been prepared in a variety of good doctoral institutions is desirable. Find out if faculty are also immersed in ministry. How do they view themselves in the gap between the "academy" and the church and its agencies? What is the prevailing theology of ministry among the faculty?

Discover whether the professors like each other and operate in a collegial atmosphere. Is there a faculty "culture" that values and practices effective and flexible teaching, at the same time recognizing different student learning styles? Do they see themselves as mentors to students and companions on the developmental journey of emerging ministry persons? Nearly all professors will provide students with information, but the seminary experience ought also to enable you to apply that knowledge in transformational ways—in your own life first. Then the goal becomes learning how to minister in ways that take that knowledge and help others to be transformed in their lives. Do faculty members actively seek to prepare students for this work?

Ask what are the visions that faculty members have for their graduates? How would they describe the ideal graduate of their institution? In what ways do they seek to prepare such persons? Is there evidence that they are succeeding in this mission? All of this suggests the need for a deliberate and consistent effort to integrate and synthesize the curriculum with the tasks of skill development, spiritual formation, and personal wholeness and holiness.

3. What must I do to get the most out of my seminary or graduate education?

"Excellence begins by doing something you have a natural talent for and enjoy. You become totally absorbed in the work. Attention and involvement in all the details lead to success." These words of Edward C. Johnson III, chairman of the Board of Fidelity Investments, contain wisdom for those who are interested in kingdom investing as well. Your choice to attend seminary or graduate school means you will be investing a significant amount of money, time, and energy to prepare for a lifetime of excellence in service to the Lord.

Determine your growth path

Three resolutions will help you realize maximum personal growth from your investment and to pursue excellence in ministry.

Princeton Theological Seminary is a theological institution of the Presbyterian Church (USA)

120 Years in Louisville and Still Growing

In the 1850's the fledgling Southern Baptist Convention faced a growing need for trained ministers. In 1859, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary opened in Greenville, South Carolina to meet that need.

Four professors met the entering class of 26 students. The young seminary struggled to survive the tumultuous Civil War years. Classes suspended from 1862 to 1865, and the school's endowment, largely invested in Confederate bonds, was "gone with the wind."

In 1872 the city fathers of Louisville and other Kentuckians pledged $300,000 to lure the seminary. With that pledge toward the school's endowment, Southern Seminary relocated to Louisville in 1877. Eighty-nine men enrolled that fall, and four professors taught them how to preach God's Word.

From early on, Southern has had a reputation for cutting edge ministerial training. One historian has called Southern Seminary one of the most innovative seminaries in the world.

Southern was the first seminary in the world to offer the study of the Bible in English. In 1944 the seminary opened one of the first schools of church music and now boasts the top music library in the country. The school of Christian Education and Leadership opened in 1954. Southern was the first seminary to offer African American studies.

In May 1957, a young evangelist named Billy Graham made one of his many visits to the seminary. His picture, with the Seminary choir in the background, made the cover of Newsweek magazine. In 1994 the Billy Graham School of Missions, tory preaching. The Graham School's D.Min. in Evangelism and Church Growth is the fastest growing D.Min. in the world.

These non-resident degree programs allow ministers to stay in their current ministry position while coming to campus for four one week courses over two-and-a-half years. Continuing the school's innovative tradition, students can also earn their master of divinity degree taking weekend courses.

Southern Seminary serves the churches of the SBC, but it attracts students from many Christian denominations because of its reputation for academic excellence and offering one of the least expensive theological programs in the country.

Southern Seminary has come a long way in 139 years. With more than 2,200 students and more than 60 faculty, it is one of the largest seminaries in the world. The seminary's endowment has grown from $300,000 to more than $70 million. Southern's graduates serve in churches and ministries throughout Kentucky, in all 50 states, and in 76 foreign countries.

"Our goal is to be the finest evangelical seminary in the world," President R. Albert Mohler, Jr., says. With the help of faculty, staff, students, alumni and friends, Southern Seminary is accomplishing that goal. ■

Evangelism and Church Growth opened to carry-on the legacy of Southern Baptists' greatest evangelist.

Last fall, Southern made a quantum leap toward becoming the finest theological seminary in the world with the addition of nine new professors to its faculty. In October, the ribbon was cut on a new $3.56 million conference and dining facility and a $1.7 million renovation of classroom space completed in August. Funds are currently being raised to construct a new building to house the Billy Graham School.

Last year Southern introduced a new doctor of ministry degree in exposi-

Doctor of Ministry in Pastoral Care & Counseling

The effective application of the inerrant Word of God to the emotional and spiritual needs of hurting individuals represents one of the greatest challenges facing ministry leaders today. As never before, it demands a thorough understanding of Scriptural truth and a firm grasp of proven psychological principles.

Western Seminary's new Doctor of Ministry Track in Pastoral Care and Counseling is designed for ministry leaders and caregivers who desire to deepen their insights into human need and to sharpen their pastoral counseling skills. The convenient seminar format means that you can work toward your degree while continuing to serve in your church or ministry.

Choose to enjoy. The attitude with which you approach the rigorous demands of advanced education will make a significant difference in the quality of your experience. Wise students know how to "keep their eyes on the prize" of graduation. Even wiser students know that today is also a gift to be seized and savored—that learning the concept counts more than earning the grade.

You will need to develop good habits—skillful time management and disciplined study practices—that will increase your enjoyment by reducing your stress. Intense study will necessarily challenge you. Put the intensity to good use by developing the personal disciplines of success that will help you in school and beyond.

You can choose the attitudes that will keep your education from becoming ing drudgery. Curiosity will lead you to say, "I'm going to ask questions until I know what I think about the issue." Courage will help you say, "Instead of avoiding biblical languages, I'm going to master them." Confidence will enable you to say, "God has called me. He will strengthen me." These are attitudes that will allow you to enjoy the trip as well as the destination.

Plan to grow. Readings. Papers. Discussions. Lectures. Journals. All these will provide the rich soil that facilitates growth—but you must bring the oxygen and light. That means being teachable and open to changing your viewpoint when there is good evidence to do so. It means being candid and vulnerable without being defensive. It can also mean disagreeing agreeably when it looks as though the evidence points your way.

The MacArthur Study Bible* didn't happen by accident.
Neither will your effectiveness in ministry.

A young seminary student once asked me what the secret is to a great sermon. My answer wasn't what he expected.

"Stay in your chair until the hard work is done."

I stand by that. There's nothing magical about being an effective student and communicator of the Bible. It's a skill you learn, cultivate, then put to work. God's Word deserves nothing less. God's people need nothing more.

It was that commitment to helping God's people understand His Word that prompted me to create The MacArthur Study Bible.

And that same commitment is what you'll find at The Master's Seminary. Wherever God is leading you to minister, you'll find we're committed to giving you the skills you need to minister God's Word to God's people, God's way.

Effective ministry doesn't happen by accident. It takes hard work.

Pull up a chair and we'll show you how.

Vocation or Occupation? (from page 128)

To receive maximum benefit from your education, be intentional about your growth. Students, alums, and profs, reflecting on their experience, offered these tips:

- "Carefully build a personal library, and develop good reading habits, broad and purposeful."
- "Strive to integrate and synthesize what you are learning and what you are experiencing in ministry, at school, and at home."
- "Develop a good filing system, and stash your best finds for later use."
- "Keep a diary or journal regularly. Be reflective."
- "Know your preferred learning style, but work to gain comfort with other options."
- "Learn how to learn collaboratively, and become adept at group processes."

Commit to connect. "Wherever I am, I want to be all there." The expressed desire of Jim Elliot, murdered missionary to the "Auca" Indians in Ecuador, has much to say to those seeking the most of their educational experience.

"Being all there" in seminary or graduate school means realizing that you can gain as much from relationships as from books. Community is a vital part of the full experience. Don't be a "hit and run" student, rushing onto the campus for just an hour or two of classes. Become an active member. Attend convocations and lectures. Drink coffee with a friend. Reach out to a stranger.

One important antidote to "hit and run" education is linking up with a mentor. Teachers or staff persons will often invest themselves in honest relationships with you. Steven Garber, in Fabric of Faithfulness, says that a lasting friendship with a mentor who embodies and lives out his or her relationship with Christ is critical to your life as a person of faith. As much can happen outside the classroom as within it.

For over 75 years: the passion and spirit for the Great Commission.

"...several hundred miles nearer to China than other trade routes across the Pacific..." So read the 1926 catalog of Simpson College—pointing out the advantage of its remote location in accessing the unsaved in China.

Since then, our campus has moved—our evangelical focus has become global, but the passion and the spirit for the mission that ignited the college in those days burns as strong as ever. Throughout our history, we've kept our focus on Jesus Christ and His church.

Innovative Programs

We offer 14 graduate and 28 undergraduate programs—some focused on full-time ministry, some geared toward careers in other fields. But whatever the program, students benefit from our emphasis on individual spiritual formation as well as preparation for church leadership. We have countless opportunities for ministry—from missions work worldwide to service with churches and other organizations in this area.

Spiritual Formation

Leadership

Our sense of innovation is demonstrated through several programs, such as our master's in ministry and missiology offered in a modular format. Which means full-time professionals can pursue advanced studies during one-week sessions three times a year. Also our three-summer education program, a convenient way to earn a master's degree in education.

No wonder Simpson is expanding. Our increase in enrollment (including many married students) makes us one of the fastest growing colleges in the nation. We're also growing in facilities, continuing to add new buildings to our impressive campus in this wonderfully scenic region of northern California.

If you'd like to be part of all this—if you want to share in our mission, come join us. For more information, give us a call: 800-598-2493 or 530-224-5606.

We'll help
there!

Finally, commit to connect to God. That connection will be no easier after graduation. There won't be fewer demands in the ministry. A thousand voices will always be clamoring for your attention. Discipline yourself now to hear the still, small voice first.

If you approach your advanced studies with a positive plan and an attitude of commitment, you will find both your mind and your faith enlarged.

Pursuing a graduate or seminary degree is a major commitment. This is not a decision to make haphazardly. Finding a program that fits you and preparing yourself to learn as best you can will enhance your success. If you approach your advanced studies with a positive plan and an attitude of commitment, you will find both your mind and your faith enlarged. Graduate or seminary study is an investment in excellence that will pay dividends for a lifetime of service and worship.

4. What should I be doing to prepare myself for seminary or graduate school? How ought one prepare spiritually? Educationally?

Having determined that seminary or graduate school is one of the ways God wants to equip you for the "good works that God has prepared beforehand for us to do," and having selected and been accepted by a school, what can be done before you enroll to help make the most of your future training experience?

Don't wait until you get there

First, keep your walk with God strong by spending some extra time in prayer and in the study of his Word. As a graduate student preparing for vocational ministry, you will have many balls to juggle simultaneously. Before classes begin, see if you can take time out for some focused spiritual self-care. Go on a private weekend retreat or, over a period of weeks, carve out times to do some extra journaling or spend some additional time in reflective prayer. During these moments, commit yourself to following God wherever he leads during the next phase of your life.

Second, determine to take advantage of every learning experience that you possibly can while you are in school. Pore over every page of the curriculum catalog, highlighting every course you want to take and dreaming about all the special programs that you would enjoy (like doing internships in urban settings or studying abroad). Plan how you might participate in as many of them as possible. Who knows which one will open up doors of opportunity (Continued on page 14)

An education for your head, your heart, and your hands.

North Park Theological Seminary offers an education which embraces not just one's mind, but one's life: body and soul, weekday and weekend. It is education where you are active in ministry while preparing for ministry.

Knowledge is crucial, and at North Park Seminary, the graduate theological seminary of The Evangelical Covenant Church, we are committed to intense, thorough study of the Bible and the Christian tradition. At the same time, we are committed to acting with justice and compassion, and to nurturing spiritual growth. We provide a holistic education to prepare you for an effective ministry in today's world as pastors, missionaries, evangelists, educators, youth workers, administrators, and chaplains.

At North Park the faculty see themselves as guiding partners, not remote experts. Because for more than a century the faculty of North Park have believed we must be with the students in real-life settings, engaging whole-life issues, responding with new-life hope.

The realities of ministry have changed.

In today's culture, seminaries more than ever need to produce people who can effectively communicate biblical truths – who through God's grace have a proper view of themselves and others – people of integrity who are prepared to lead. At Bethel Seminary we've always worked at those things. But recently we launched a whole new way of doing seminary. Where personal growth and development and practical leadership skills are completely and consistently woven into sound academics. They are inseparable. Call 800 255-8706 ext. 6288 today for more information.

What you hear could affect your vision.

at you never dreamed of? Or prepare u for circumstances you never would ve thought yourself facing?

Third, commit to living a balanced
e. Begin implementing your commit-ent before you start school. Your eduational pursuits have the potential mer to enhance or sabotage your alth, relationships, and ministry. God eated us with certain maintenance uirements: food, sleep, exercise, y, work, a deepening relationship
h God, and flourishing relationships h other people. Since these are built-needs that must be met, now is the ie to seriously evaluate your lifestyle.
etermine what personal or spiritual ciplines you will need to emphasize order to maintain your quality of life ing graduate school.

For example, let's say that in con-ering how to prepare both your mind d body for the rigors of graduate education you determine that you would benefit from a more systematic exercise program and that you would also like to become more disciplined in doing Bible memorization. You could merge the two goals by choosing forms of physical training that are repetitive (jogging, bicycling, rowing) and would allow you to focus on memorizing Scripture while you work out. Consider inviting your spouse or other friends to join you for the social interaction and accountability that would enhance the experience.

Fourth, determine your proficiency in the survival skills of graduate school.
If you don't own a personal computer, seriously consider purchasing one that has a good word-processing program.
This will significantly improve the quality and speed with which you can write papers. If you don't already own a computer, or if you want to upgrade to a more powerful one, check to see whether you can get an educational discount if you purchase a computer through the school you will be attending. Consider taking a class to enhance your word-processing expertise.

Perhaps you should consider buying an inexpensive "typing tutor" software program so you can practice daily until your typing speed is up to at least 70 words per minute. This could double the quality of the papers you write because you will be able to spend less time typing and more time composing and refining your thoughts.

Another graduate school survival skill is public speaking. Both in school and in ministry you will constantly be called upon to articulate your thoughts.
For this reason, learn everything you can about how to become an effective verbal communicator. Whether or not your program of study requires courses in public speaking or preaching, consider giving your education a jump-start by obtaining some training (such as Toastmasters) and experience (such as teaching a Sunday-school class) in this area before you start school.

Think about taking a class or doing a self-study course in English grammar and vocabulary; building your word power will significantly improve the quality of both your writing and speaking. Knowing and using your primary language effectively will also help you to become proficient—quickly—in biblical languages.

Preparation for ministry need not be delayed until enrollment in seminary. Many students are already engaged in active ministry before they enroll. Ideally, seminary is preparation in ministry, not merely preparation for ministry.

Learning that lasts a lifetime

Philosopher-novelist Frank Herbert said, "Cultivate naïveté. Thinking you know something is a sure way to blind yourself. It is not growing up that slowly kills the brakes to learning but an accumulation of 'things I know.'"

Commit yourself to lifelong learning. Ministry requires it! Then search until you find a graduate school or seminary that offers you the three essential resources to follow through on your commitment: critical thinking skills, social and spiritual formation skills, and leadership skills. Search for a Spirit-powered, biblically grounded community of learning that is committed to biblical and theological foundations of the Christian faith. Seek a school dedicated to developing and equipping people to become progressively more whole and holy. Find a school whose faculty, staff, and students are committed to serving and leading churches and ministry agencies in ways that transform the way they serve.

Then join them in the journey.

George K. Brushaber, president of Bethel College & Seminary; Sandra Mark, senior grants officer; and Lelan E. Harris, acting director of supervised ministry, Bethel Theological Seminary, Paul, Minnesota.

International School of Theology

Mentoring at the Graduate Level

At International School of Theology mentoring is a lifestyle. As a student at International, you will be personally mentored by faculty like Dr. Alan Scholes. Whether he is teaching at International's residence campus in California, the extension site in south Texas, or in a concentrated seminar in Hong Kong, Alan spends most of his time working with individual students. Helping students apply what they are learning to their own intimate relationship to God as well as their current and future ministries has been a passion of Alan's throughout his career.

Dr. Scholes continues to pioneer new ways of mentoring at the graduate level such as International's Accelerated Part-time Program and graduate Biblical training via the internet. Alan is not unique at International. Faculty with doctorates from Cambridge, Claremont, Dallas, Fuller and USC are all dedicated to merging the highest quality academic instruction with personalized, practical ministry training.

Jesus' Unanswered Prayers

When Jesus prayed to the one who could save him from death, he did not get that salvation;
he got instead the salvation of the world.

When prayer seems more like struggle than relationship, when I find myself repeating the same requests over and over and even wonder, "Is anyone really listening?" I take no small comfort in remembering that Jesus, too, had unanswered prayers. Three come to mind.

As Luke records, Jesus spent an entire night in prayer before choosing the inner core of twelve disciples. Yet if you read the Gospels, you marvel that this dodgy dozen could be the answer to any prayer. They included, Luke pointedly notes, "Judas Iscariot, who became a traitor," not to mention the petty ambitious Sons of Thunder and the hothead Simon, whom Jesus would once address as "Satan."

"O unbelieving generation," Jesus would sigh about these twelve, "how long shall I stay with you? How long shall I put up with you?" I wonder if, in that moment of exasperation, Jesus questioned the Father's guidance.

Technically, I admit, the particular makeup of the twelve does not qualify as an unanswered prayer, for we have no reason to believe that any other choices might have served Jesus better. Yet I find it comforting that while on earth Jesus faced the same limitations as does anyone in leadership. The Son of God himself could only work with the talent pool available.

Eventually, except for Judas, the twelve underwent a slow but steady transformation, providing a kind of long-term answer. John, a Son of Thunder, softened into "the apostle of Love." Peter, who earned Jesus' rebuke by recoiling from the idea of Messiah's suffering, later urged his followers to "follow in his steps" by suffering as Christ did.

The second "unanswered prayer" occurred in the Garden of Gethsemane when, as Luther put it, "God struggled with God." While Jesus lay prostrate on the ground, sweat falling from him like drops of blood, his prayers took on an uncharacteristic tone of pleading. He "offered up prayers and petitions with loud cries and tears to the one who could save him from death," the Letter to the Hebrews says, but of course Jesus knew he would not be saved from death. As that awareness grew, Jesus felt distress. He had no community of support—they had all fallen asleep. "Could you not keep watch for one hour?" he chided.

A dramatic change takes place, however, between that scene in the garden and what follows. The Gospel accounts of Gethsemane show a person in anguish. Afterward they show one who, more than Pilate, more than Herod, acts in utter control. At his trials Jesus is no victim; he is serene, the master of his destiny.

What happened in the garden? What made the difference? We have few details about the content of Jesus' prayers, since potential witnesses were all doing. He may have reviewed his entire ministry on earth. The weight of all that went undone may have borne down upon him: his disciples were unstable; the movement seemed in peril; God-chosen people had rejected him; the world still harbored evil and much suffering.

Jesus himself seemed at the very edge of human endurance. He no more relished the idea of pain and death than you or I do. "Everything is possible for you," Jesus pleaded to the Father. "Take this cup from me."

Somehow, though, in Gethsemane Jesus worked through that crisis by transferring the burden to the Father. It was God's will he had come to do, after all, and his plea resolved into these words: "Yet not what I will, but what you will." Not many hours later he could cry out, in profound summation, "It is finished."

Hebrews mysteriously concludes that, though Jesus was not saved from death, nevertheless he was heard because of his reverent submission. Though he was a son, he learned obedience from what he suffered."

How many times have I prayed for one thing only to receive another? I long for the sense of detachment, of trust, that I see in Gethsemane. God alone is qualified to answer my prayers, even if it means transmuting them from my own self-protective will into God's perfect will. When Jesus prayed to the one who could save him from death, he did not get that salvation; he got instead the salvation of the world.

The third unanswered prayer appears in another intimate scene recorded by John, Jesus' last supper with his disciples. Jesus expands the scope of his prayer beyond the walls of the Upper Room, to encompass even those of us who live today:

My prayer is not for them [the disciples] alone. I pray also for those who will believe in me through their message, that all of them may be one, Father, just as you are in me and I am in you. May they also be in us so that the world may believe that you have sent me. I have given them the glory that you gave me, that they may be one as we are one: I in them and you in me. May they be brought to complete unity to let the world know that you sent me and have sent them.

Disunity virtually defines the history of the church. Pick at random any year of history—today—and you will see how far short we fall of Jesus' final request. The church, and the watchful world, still await an answer.

"I decided I needed to attend seminary when I realized I was in the ministry."

Linda is the Pastoral Assistant at her church; the Senior Pastor is Dr. Mike Armistead. The Smith Family (from back): Tanner, Cameron, Linda, Morgan, Tom... and the dogs.

Linda McMillan Smith got the bad news while she was studying for a Master's Degree in Counseling at a state university.

"I was in an ethics class, and my professor said you should never share your religious faith with clients," remembers Linda.

She was incredulous: "I just found God—the key to everything—and I can't share it?"

Linda was so distraught that a classmate told her, "Take Clinical Pastoral Education (CPE) at a teaching hospital and become a chaplain."

She enrolled and soon found herself working with AIDS and heart patients.

Recalls Linda, "It was the biggest growing experience of my life."

But there was no time for rest. She followed CPE with hospice training, along with greater involvement in her local church. A friend, seeing Linda respond to the call to ministry, first said the word seminary.

"I came to Gordon-Conwell in Charlotte because—with classes on weekends—I can pursue a degree without giving up my family, my job, or my ministry."

"I quickly found that I am not alone. My classmates here come from many walks of life, but they all share a strong commitment to preparing for ministry."

At Gordon-Conwell, Linda's first class was Hebrew—the language—and she loved it. She is now on track to finish her M.Div. in the Fall of 1999.

"For me, getting involved in ministry has been the missing link in my life. It has made my faith come alive."

The Burden of Spencer Perkins

INSIDE CT

In 1968 our nation suddenly and unexpectedly lost its leading light on racial issues. I felt history repeating itself for me when I heard the news that Spencer Perkins had been taken from us. On January 27, the president of Reconcilers Fellowship in Jackson, Mississippi, and the son of evangelist/activist John Perkins died suddenly and unexpectedly of a heart attack at age 43 (see the obituary on p. 73).

In 1993 Spencer and his white ministry partner, Chris Rice, authored More Than Equals: Racial Healing for the Sake of the Gospel (InterVarsity). CT ran an excerpt about Spencer's early struggle to assimilate two facts: one, that he was redeemed by Christ and, two, that many whites, allegedly redeemed by the same Christ, hated him ("How I Learned to Love White People," Sept. 13, 1993, p. 34). He told of his despair when, at age 13, a white principal assented to a classmate's judgment that Spencer was "just a nigger"; his pain at 16 when he saw the humiliation in his father's eyes after John was ambushed and beaten almost to death for his civil-rights work; the confusion and hurt of being befriended and then rejected by a white college student. While his story of growing up black in America was powerful, it was not unique. The freshness came in his gospel-centered message.

For Spencer, the burden for racial reconciliation was heavy: "If white and black Christians could not be reconciled, then either the gospel was a lie or we really weren't indwelt by the Christ we said had taken up residence in our lives."

Yet this burden never provided an excuse to play down hard truths: "Most black people are angry—angry about our violent history, angry for the hassle it is to grow up black in America, angry that we can never assume that we won't be prejudged by our color, angry that we will carry this stigma everywhere we go. . . . And most of all angry that white America doesn't understand the reasons for our anger." This anger can be "a very destructive force" or "channeled positively," but it "must be reckoned with."

In journalist Edward Gilbreath's cover story on evangelicals and race 30 years after Martin Luther King, Jr. (see "Catching Up with a Dream," p. 20), we hear more of Spencer's hard truths: how segregation in the church is what both blacks and whites war "but that puts comfort and culture over Christ."

Lately Spencer talked about "radical grace" as the key to moving to the next step in racial reconciliation. But once again God has left it to us to finish the conversation without our group leader.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Trucker's testimony

■ The message in large, bold letters on the mudflap of a tractor-trailer truck passed on I-80 somewhere between Iowa and Connecticut last November riveted my wife and me with its terse ONLY JESUS SAVES. A lively discussion ensued about the importance of the word only. Little did we realize it was the Lord's preparation for the insights in Daniel B. Clendenin's powerful presentation ["The Only Way" Jan. 12]. With hindsight, it can be concluded that the long-haul trucker was correct in his exclusiveness and diligent in his obedience to the Great Commission.

Peter Kushkowski
Haddam, Conn.

■ I agree with the points Clendenin made. I just wish he had not overlooked the words of the apostle Paul. Romans 1:20 tells us God is so clearly seen in his creation that man is without excuse, and Romans 2:14-15 tells that us when the Gentiles instinctively do the things contained in the Law they reveal the law written in their hearts, an experience analogous to the new covenant.

Because God does not want anyone to be lost, because God always does that which is right, in my opinion Paul suggests that God could save those who never heard the gospel because they saw Jesus the Creator revealed in his creation and on that basis lived instinctively for him experiencing what we would call the new covenant.

On the basis of biblical evidence, I would have to answer Clendenin's question, "Yes, God can certainly save those who have never heard the gospel." I believe he would prefer that all hear the gospel. But not all have heard or will hear the gospel because of our failure to proclaim it. Should they then be lost because of our failure? It seems to me that Paul describes for us a just, fair, and loving God's alternative.

Vialo Weis
Yukon, Okla.

■ Clendenin's article is to be commended for its pointedness and sensitivity. Perhaps it is too simplistic an observation, but for any Christian to believe that Jesus Christ is truly the Son of God and also to believe theological pluralism is an ultimate absurdity. In fact, it is just plain slanderous of God. If Jesus is indeed God's Son and theological pluralism be true, then God is both foolish and evil; not only foolish to have needlessly sacrificed his only Son when there were other ways for man to be saved, but also evil to have done so, the other ways making it quite unnecessary.

Pastor Clifford A. Hurst
Hurst Union Road Pentecostal Church
Dayton, Ohio

I believe the error of pluralism is a failure to understand who Christ really is. What comes out from this world-view is that Christ is a "peer" of Muhammad, Buddha, Confucius, and the like. The Christian knows this is not accurate and that Christ is very God, one with the Father. To say that no one comes to God except through Christ is not narrow; it just acknowledges the truth that no one comes to God except through God. Any attempt to reach God through other religions must go through Christ eventually if it has any hope of being successful. A high view of who Christ is solves the problems of exclusiveness, narrowness, and so on.

Robert C. Vanstrum
Dellwood, Minn.

A place for discomfort

Frederica Mathewes-Green's article "Wanted: A New Pro-Life Strategy" [Jan. 12] encourages the pro-life community to trade political activism, which she says does not work, for a model of sympathetic persuasion. I believe Mathewes-Green draws up a false dichotomy. Active listening and sympathetic discussions are effective in crisis-pregnancy centers and in intimate settings, but they are not sufficient to end abortion. There is no need to take an either/or stance on pro-life strategy. The sin of abortion is invasive both at the personal and the institutional level. Different tactics are called for depending on the intended audience and on specific goals.

As Mathewes-Green acknowledges, most people know it's a baby. However, the American conscience needs to be stung repeatedly by the truth that killing a baby is wrong. Old Testament history reminds us how easy it is for a generation to slide into complacently accepting evil. Many pro-lifers are weary, and some may wonder if the battle is worth it. Just as we are called to persevere in our personal walk with God, so we need to persevere in the down and dirty business of telling the world that abortion is wrong, and in the sometimes even dirtier business of political involvement.

Mary A. Waalke
Boulder, Colo.

■ While applauding Mathewes-Green's suggestion that we move beyond "avoidance and fury" in the abortion debate, would add one further consideration to her suggestion that "we should explore whether marriage is a possibility." While she cites statistics of the success of "shotgun" marriages (and they are impressive statistics), shouldn't the spiritual state of both parties be included in our exploration? If the principle of being "unequally yoked" mentioned in 2 Corinthians applies to the marriage bond, then we could find ourselves complicating sin with sin by encouraging a believer to marry an unbeliever [just because] one of them is pregnant.

James Menzies
Wakefield, R.I.

Mathewes-Green lists three points for new strategy: (1) It's a baby, (2) Abortion hurts women, (3) We can live without abortion. Under these she further details how to advance this strategy by speaking to the woman about preventing pregnancy, supporting those who experience an unexpected pregnancy, becoming a friend exploring marriage to the baby's father, encouraging adoption, and so on.

This made me wonder: "What have been doing for the last 13 years?" We have been, on a daily basis, setting this strategy before the clients of the pregnancy-help centers for many years.

There was a fourth point with which we must take great exception—the recommendation not to speak to people who are not religious about God or Scripture because Mathewes-Green has found such an approach to be "nearly always ineffective and because you may be seen as 'one of those.'" However, I have found the opposite to be true.

When first in the pregnancy-help center movement, we were taught to counsel women without bringing up the concept of God. However, if it appeared the woman was receptive, we could broach the subject but be ready to retreat if there was any sign she was not ready to hear the mention of his name. Years of frustration followed as I and those I taught struggled

HOW DO YOU IMPART BIBLICAL PRINCIPLES IN A CYBERSPACE, GLOBAL VILLAGE, POST-CHRISTIAN ERA? By Teaching...

THE FIRST PRINCIPLES

Establishing believers in the faith has always been important. In today's culture it's also absolutely essential!

To effectively teach what Paul referred to as the elementary principles — literally the first principles — you need help. Help like good Bible study guides.

The First Principles Series Bible study guides, published by LearnCorp Resources, are exceptional tools that can help your church establish believers in the faith. They present core biblical truths through an educationally sound, biblically accurate study model that teaches students to think, not just fill in blanks.

Written by Jeff Reed, founder of LearnCorp Resources and BILD-International, The First Principles Series is the culmination of decades of local church ministry and international church establishing.

If your burden is to see believers grow into a mature faith, then The First Principles Series is what you have been looking for. But don't just take our word for it. Call LearnCorp Resources at 1-888-540-9818, and we'll send you additional information and a valuable certificate for 50% off on the purchase of a single copy of the first book in the series, Becoming a Disciple. Examine it and judge for yourself. We think you'll agree that the rock-solid presentation of essential biblical truths is exactly the help your church has been looking for.

to present that strategy. We knew deep in our hearts there was something missing.

Eventually we realized that gagging our speech about God was wrong. Without speaking about God, sharing his message of salvation, peace, mercy, forgiveness, and love, there cannot be a change of life and heart. As much as I agree that we must (continue to) "listen carefully to pro-choicers in order to understand their reasoning," my experience with women in the counseling room, as well as my understanding of Scripture, indicates that the abortion issue is not a faulty-reasoning issue but rather a matter of the client's heart and spiritual condition.

When done in a respectful, loving, and sensitive way, speaking about the God of love through biblical counseling is the most effective and longest-lasting approach.

✉ At first, the article urged cooperation between pro-life and pro-choice groups in a way that could dramatically impact the annual carnage wrought by abortion.

However, it turned out merely to be a smoother approach to the standard bottom line: We must pass laws that will force all pregnant women to carry every pregnancy to full term regardless. Such an absolute stand means the carnage will continue.

Don Hawley
Portland, Oreg.

About a year ago I came across a statistic saying that 85 percent of women contemplating abortion, who then have an opportunity to view their own sonogram, choose not to abort the child. This explains why abortion clinics position the screen so that only the physician can view it. It occurred to me that the most effective deterrent to abortion may be a law that required clinics to offer a woman the option of viewing her sonogram.

I began calling pro-life leaders throughout our state. I expected to have someone politely explain to me why such an idea was naïve and impractical. To my surprise I was met with praise and excitement.

I talked with a couple of individuals about devising a strategy for such a bill. We spoke of presenting it from a pro-choice perspective, the difference being that our bill allowed for informed choice rather than blind choice. The initial reaction was one of enthusiasm. I was asked to come to Annapolis to meet with pro-life leaders. [But dates for] meetings to be held in August or September passed. I then spoke with a representative who came to my office and asked me to abandon this approach, at least temporarily, and get involved in an attempt to ban partial-birth abortion in Maryland. I agreed.

Still another contact with Maryland Right-to-Life suggested I abandon all hope for "an informed consent bill." Her logic: "We don't want to be perceived as being too pushy." I was then told that if I persisted in pushing for informed consent, the local news media "will rip you to shreds."

If a bill requiring clinics to give women the option of seeing their sonogram is not feasible, then fine. But if we are backing out under the threat of a hostile press, something is wrong.

Life is precious

Your editorial "What Really Died in Oregon" [Jan. 12] prompted me, for the first time, to consider the seriousness of the assisted-suicide issue. Life is very precious, and for a person to lose that divine spark, it must be the result of the unavoidable collapse of one's health, not

A STORY OF GREATNESS

J. I. PACKER

A Biography

Thomas Carlyle wrote, "The history of the world is but the biography of great men." One of those great men, J. I. Packer, has helped shape Christianity in the modern world through his preaching, teaching and writing.

Christianity Today recently identified J. I. Packer as one of the most influential theological writers of the twentieth century. In this biography, he has his life and ministry examined by another leading evangelical theologian, Alister McGrath.

Readers will gain insight into the growth and development of evangelicalism in the twentieth century as they learn about this great man.

product of a bad day. Whether or not I'm a burden to myself and society, the breath that is within me was given to me by the grace of God, and to snuff it out by my own hand would be a denial of the providence of the Almighty.

Perhaps if the naysayers, who adamantly proclaim the end of the Age of Miracles, would quiet their rumbling, the afflicted might be able to hear the voice of God, for God is able to do exceedingly, abundantly, above all we can ask or think. That would include healings as well. *David A. Brayshaw

The largely HMO-controlled medical industry in this country does, indeed, create a market for the services of Dr. Death. HMOs are set up to serve persons with illnesses and injuries that have a specific etiology and a limited duration and, therefore, are readily treatable with one or two of the conventional therapies.

Those persons whose bodies suffer from more mysterious, intractable ailments and so refuse to recover quickly and efficiently soon get the message that the maintenance of their health is not worth the required trouble and expense. Negative conclusions about the relative worth of their own (increasingly miserable) existence follow predictably.

When the bottom line is, well, the bottom line, much that is so much more valuable than the saving and making of money is irrevocably lost. The Oregon vote is the voice of the future in HMO-land.

✶ Kudos to Charles Colson for his column on the spirituality spin that advertisers are more commonly employing as they try to charm the consumer ["Madison Avenue's Spiritual Chic," Jan. 12]. Apparently these days not only sex but spirituality sells, and our corporate community continues to cash in on whatever works. Indeed, their philosophical motives are rarely neutral. Unfortunately, Colson failed to comment on the most prevalent and perhaps most pernicious message that advertisers preach, hardly "neutral," and certainly "spiritual": consumerism. Or hopping malls are the cathedrals where we "worship." As we excavate and critique advertising philosophies, let's not forget the foundational philosophy that tempts all of us—contentment through our credit cards.

Greg Mortimer

Colson's anecdote about how his criticism of one auto company's ad campaign led to change is encouraging. But he seems to extrapolate from that event a belief that similar complaints by the rest of us will have similar effects. He overlooks the reality of his own position and influence.

More disconcerting was the juxtaposition of the questions "When our kids hum the catchy jingle of the latest commercial, their spiritual impulse being diverted into consumerism? Are they absorbing Madison Avenue's false values?" with the statement "Ads with spiritual themes trivialize religion by reducing it to a marketing ploy." I think Colson is confused about who is absorbing and trivializing what.

The trivialization of religion by commercialism can as easily be a charge laid against the "Christian" publishing houses that have often sacrificed content in their publications and replaced it with marketing glitz. And "Madison Avenue's false values" were adopted long ago by churches in North America, which assumed a model of the corporate world as a standard of success. We have replaced the concept of a pastor with the idea of a CEO. Many of my colleagues in pastoral ministry are nearly being crushed by the expectations of Christians that we perform as corporate executives. I was wonderfully trained at seminary to perform theologically and pastorally, only to realize that the churches' expectations require an M.B.A. rather than an M.Div. Christianity, at least in this country, bought "Madison Avenue" a long time ago.

By the way, my children know that humming "the catchy jingle of the latest commercial" will result in the swift imposition of a television viewing moratorium in our home.

Beware the Spotlight

We are called to be suspicious of the Christian celebrity culture.

Several years ago, in the aftermath of Christian musician Michael English's affair with a backup singer, one Nashville pastor told Billboard's Debra Evans Price: "We dress people up, put make-up on them, have stylists do their hair, put them on a stage in front of thousands of people, shine a spotlight on them, and then expect them to be humble."

And this is the surprising part: We are still surprised when they are not humble or when Christian celebrities fall.

This past February was the ten-year anniversary of the public disgrace of Jimmy Swaggart, who has become a powerful symbol of Christian celebrityism gone wrong. On page 30 of this issue, Randall Balmer recounts a visit to Swaggart's church and reports on a weary evangelist and preacher who has had a hard time forgiving those who were critical of him and who has not been entirely successful at learning from his mistakes.

Swaggart, the media figure, reminds us that the Christian-leader-as-personality cult is dangerous for both the celebrity and his or her followers. Humility is indeed a tall order for those in the seductive glow of the spotlight. Celebrityism, even among Christians, is a snare.

Wisdom demands that we become suspicious of celebrities. A big, red "Be skeptical" sign should flash in our minds whenever we see Christian personalities plastered on our book and magazine covers or hear their smooth voices sweetening our TVs and radios. Skepticism is not cynicism; Paul's poetic description of how love "believes all things" (1 Cor. 13:7) is not an excuse for credulity or blind faith, least of all not in human beings with feet of clay. After all, Jesus admonished us to be "as shrewd as snakes" as we try to be as "innocent as doves" (Matt. 10:16, NIV) in a sinful world. And Paul knew the necessity of testing everything (1 Thess. 5:21). We need to recognize the painful truth that the pervasiveness of worldly entertainment values within the evangelical subculture has a tendency to minimize the gospel content.

Martin Luther King, Jr.'s antidote to racism—that we judge people by "the content of their character"—also works as a powerful antidote to the personality culture in which we live. The headlines make it painfully obvious that fame cannot be equated with character.

So we ask: Have we learned these lessons about celebrityism in the church? Have we taken to heart the painful truths Swaggart taught us?

Transformers vs. sectarians

Christian singer Steve Camp doesn't think so. In an October 1997 manifesto studded with 107 theses (a 13 percent gain over Luther's 95), Camp raised alarm over the contemporary Christian music (CCM) industry's lack of holy living, its penchant for skewed doctrine, and its unequal yoking with the secular owners of the once-Christian record labels. Camp called for a renewed devotion to Scripture along with a renewed infusion of biblical teaching in CCM lyrics. And he called for the record labels to buy back their independence from the media conglomerates that own them.

His separationism, he claims, is not isolationism (We must befriend unbelievers and witness to them he explains). Neither is his vision one that could ever be as salt and light, transforming an industry. His harsh denunciations of Christian artists working for secular companies makes one wonder how Christian conductor Herbert Blomstedt, to take on example, could work for the Communist government of East Germany as the director of the Dresden Staatskapelle for many years and have such a vibrant witness. How artists can have a Christian witness while working for secular organizations is unimagined in Camp's philosophy. Yet many have.

Despite his naïve come-outism, many of Camp's prescriptions are precisely what will preserve or rescue those whose lives are devoted to the personality-driven worlds of the CCM industry, of religious broadcasting, and of the writing and publishing of bestselling Christian books. Those prescriptions are a return to biblical morality, literacy, and accountability—and, above all, repentance.

Interestingly, that is what some Nashville sources say is now happening. Having covered the Christian music business for over ten years, Billboard's Price says that the spiritual discipline of musicians has actually grown as the industry has exploded from just a handful of music celebrities whose influence was largely locked inside a Christian subculture to a new era when Jars of Clay can appear on Late Show with David Letterman, and Christian singers are entertaining and witnessing in a broader context.

"Our industry has ambassadors taking the message to the mainstream," Price says, "but I haven't seen negative fallout from that. People in our industry take great pains to be grounded in their faith and not to be distracted."

Many artists have now established advisory boards to hold them accountable, she says, and Nashville pastors have begun focusing their ministry more tightly on the spiritual needs of touring musicians. Sadder but wiser artists have learned the hard way that they need to focus quality time on their families and home congregations. Singing in other people's churches every weekend has proved to be a great way to lose your own soul.

Prescriptions for humility

In the culture of celebrity, the entertainer, or radio preacher is driven to be more persona than person, more icon than individual. Maintaining the persona forces artists into isolation, demanding the grooming and constant maintenance of an image. The result is a social life rich in glamour but poor in community. But as Christians know, only by the grit of community is our spiritual roughness worn smooth.

Late last year, singer Sandi Patty talked candidly with CT editors about the way she has restructured family, church, and community responsibilities as she moves back into public life after a public fall. An important part of her new plan is full participation in her own local church, where people know her well and are unimpressed, in a healthy way, with her celebrity. Artists who, like Patty, avail themselves of communities of true accountability put themselves in position to be known as people by those who love them as friends, not fans, and who can warn them in strong language as well as support them in prayer.

Artists' managers are key as well, as we learned from talking to Patty's Matt Baugher and dc Talk's Rob Michaels. Says Michaels, "We constantly remind our clients that God has given them an opportunity, and with opportunity comes responsibility. They do not have a call to celebrity, but a call to be faithful with their gifting. Whatever celebrity they have is a mantle, not a right."

All public figures—politicians, radio preachers, performing artists—need someone close to them who can say balderdash when they begin excusing self-serving behavior. Writers' agents and artists' managers and all those close to religious broadcasters have a high moral responsibility to avoid being mere acolytes.

Artists also need to model commitment. Says Michaels, "People who sing to you and people who make you laugh can get things through to you that your pastor can't. Fans give celebrities power over their lives, and the celebrity must use that power responsibly." God bless those artists who have called their fans to service and sacrifice—as have the bands who play in the Rock for Life concerts. God bless those who use their brief fame for good and for telling the good news.

If the Christian music industry has needed to work at cleaning up its act, so do other parts of the evangelical subculture. Stories continue of egotistical celebrity authors who abuse ghostwriters and publicists, and politics is, well, still politics. Particularly in religious broadcasting and political activism, power and money are often treated as zero-sum games. These "industries" need to pray much about the calling of the Christian in the spotlight.

Our role

Ultimately, the responsibility for change is not centered in Nashville or Colorado Springs or any other concentration of personality-driven Christian ministry. We the public have a responsibility to be careful and critical consumers of mass culture—including its Christian forms. We have the power in our pocketbooks; we have power in our pulpits.

We can encourage what Camp calls a "Christ-less, watered-down, pabulum-based, positive alternative, aura-fluff, cream of wheat, mush-kind-of-syrupy, God-as-my-girlfriend" kind of music, or we can refuse to buy those CDs, attend those concerts, book those artists in our community's venues. We can forestall our own spiritual growth by growing dependent on largely imagined links with Christian celebrities, or we can thrive in the soil of our local congregations, where God has planted us, rightly dividing the Word of truth under the guidance of our local leaders.

As a spiritually critical public, we must be hard-nosed with our choices and purchases, supporting not only artistic excellence but spiritual maturity. And those decisions do not bear fruit in the market alone; they inevitably bring their own reward reaped in the growth of moral fiber. CT

NEW VIDEO RELEASES

NOW IN PRODUCTION

Gateway Films/Vision Video is busily at work on several more productions that you won't want to miss. Everything from Jesus and the Bible to missions, teen sexuality and spiritual growth today. More reasons why we continue to be your source for Christian videos.

Candle in the Dark

Now filming in Calcutta, one of the most gripping missionary stories ever—William Carey's monumental mission to India. Produced with our sister company, Christian History Institute, this full-length, 100-minute drama is a missions epic that tells the story of the "father of modern missions."

Jesus: The New Way

Dr. Tom Wright has blazed new trails in New Testament studies, and in this six-part documentary series Tom unfolds Jesus in His first-century world and counters much of the cynical skepticism rampant today. Tom Wright probes into the world, works, and words in such a way that it's like seeing someone you love with new eyes.

Surprised by God

Surprised by God is the candid and powerful testimony of Steve Arterburn who thought having his girlfriend get an abortion would make his life easier.

Also with Steve Arterburn, a seven-part curriculum series, Keys to Spiritual Renewal. Steve is president of New Life Clinics and host of a daily national radio program.

Sex, Love & Relationships: Straight Talk with Pam Stenzel

In a world where teens are constantly bombarded by sexual pressure, Pam Stenzel shows teens another way. In her inimitable and "no holds barred" style, Pam addresses teens in a way they rarely hear yet desperately want in this four-part series.

Chip Arnold brings the Bible alive

The Word Made Flesh Trilogy

The Word Made Flesh series captures familiar Biblical stories with passion and new meaning for today. This contemporary film trilogy, written and performed by Chip Arnold, presents the lives of Jesus, Paul, and David through three one-man stage presentations.

The Light of the World: Jesus

Follow the story of Jesus from the Jordan River to its end at the Mount of Olives. Meet his disciples. Listen as he teaches the multitudes. See his miracles that give the people hope. Share in the suffering of a crucified King and the joy of a risen Lord. Pointing directly to Jesus' destiny — Golgotha — "The Light of the World" makes the purpose of his coming known. And through this performance, the audience is confronted with the personal decision to take up Jesus' cross and follow him. 60 minutes, #4252

The Voice of the Lion: Paul

Saul of Tarsus persecuted the church as a fanatic obsessed with its destruction. He would go to any lengths to silence the heretics who claimed that Jesus — a crucified criminal — was the long-expected Messiah of Israel. But then, to the amazement of everyone, the persecutor became the preacher. Saul became Paul, and instead of persecuting churches, he established churches in almost every city he visited. By Paul's example, we realize what God was able to accomplish through a man who called himself the "chief of sinners." 60 minutes, #4253

The Singer of Israel: David

"The Singer of Israel" recounts the Biblical story in dramatic form, from David's slaying of Goliath to his destructive love for Bathsheba. It reveals a man in all his strength and weakness, yet shows us God's full compassion for him. But much more than a story of a great king, it is also the story of every man and woman who seeks after God with all his heart. 60 minutes, #4254

"Chip Arnold has a way with the characters he portrays. His acting talent alone explains how you think you have been right there with David, Paul, or Jesus. But it is also his personal faith and his perceptiveness that makes these stories... speak so eloquently with rich new meaning."

Bob Ben
Author and Speaker

"There are absolutely no words to describe Chip Arnold's presentations from the Bible. Never before have I experienced the Word of God come alive in such a fresh way. It's life changing. The Word Made Flesh Trilogy is a must see for everyone."

The Revolutionary — Parts I & II

The films to introduce young people to Jesus

Part I His story has been told to more people in more languages and in more cultures than any other. He is history's true revolutionary. He changed the world as none other before or since, and His message is more compelling today than ever. This fast-paced film on Jesus, made in high definition technology, shows His life and teaching in a way never seen before. The main events from the Gospel sources are presented with careful attention to detail and the original historical and cultural context. Originally shown in state-of-the-art virtual reality theaters, this riveting and acclaimed presentation is now offered on video in letterbox format. It's an experience you will never forget as you encounter the Revolutionary! Includes a companion guide for group discussion. Ideal for youth groups, Sunday school classes, Bible studies, and more. 48 minutes, #4197

Part II brings more of the story of Jesus and His ministry, including many critical episodes from His life. We see how He affected people and the rising opposition that gathered against Him. From the spine-chilling drama of His temptation by Satan to Jesus' glorious ascension back to the Father, the story of His life unfolds in rapid succession just as it does in the Gospels. Watch leprosy disappear with one touch of His hand. See Him raise the dead and make the blind whole. Experience His power as Jesus casts a legion of demons out of a man and into a herd of pigs! These scenes and more make the story of Jesus vividly real. Includes guide. 53 minutes, #4243

Peter and Paul

The acclaimed network television mini-series and winner of two Emmy Awards!

This distinguished production, starring Anthony Hopkins and Robert Foxworth, captures the vitality, intensity, and humanity of two who were entrusted by Christ with history's greatest stewardship — the carrying of the Gospel to all the world. They faced violent opposition from without and constant turmoil from within. Based on the Scriptures by Paul and Peter, the video shows how they were driven by a heavenly vision for a different kind of world. They paid a horrendous price for their devotion — Peter crucified and Paul beheaded — but their ministries transcended the cruelty of their enemies to become important pillars of both the Christian church and Western civilization.

CATCHING UP WITH A DREAM

Evangelicals and Race 30 Years After the Death of Martin Luther King, Jr.

EDWARD GILBREATH

As one of only two Negroes attending Los Angeles Baptist College (now Master's College), Dolphus Weary was having the time of his life experiencing a new world of white faces and middle-class culture. Born and raised in rural Mississippi, Weary had assumed he would spend the rest of his life there—until a recruiting team offered him and a friend a chance to attend a Christian liberal arts college in southern California. Other Christian schools that Weary had been interested in refused admission to Negroes. But through the urging of a bold admissions director and an ambitious basketball coach, this ultraconservative institution agreed to make Weary and his friend the first blacks who attended in its 30-year history.

Weary earned above-average grades (knowing anything less would be unacceptable) and helped lead the school's basketball team to a 19-and-5 record. Things were good. The poverty and provincialism of Negro life in southern Mississippi were out of sight, out of mind. Weary was glad to have escaped it—that is, until the day's big news made its way across campus.

As Weary left the library on April 4, 1968, a white student approached him and said, "Did you hear? Martin Luther King got shot."

"I remember running to my room, flipping on the radio, and listening to the news report," he recalls. A rifle bullet had ripped into King's neck as he stood on a motel balcony in Memphis, Tennessee. The civil-rights leader was rushed to a hospital in serious condition. "I was devastated."

As he sat on his bed holding back the tears, Weary could hear voices down the hall: white students talking about King's shooting. But Weary quickly realized that they were not just talking; they were laughing.

"I couldn't understand what I was hearing," he says. "These Christian kids were glad that Dr. King—my hero—had been shot. I wanted to run out there and confront them." Instead, he steeled his fury and laid prostrate on his bed. Finally, as the newscaster delivered the awful update—"Martin Luther King has died in a Memphis hospital."—Weary could hear the white voices down the hall let out a cheer.

That was 30 years ago. Today Dolphus Weary is the executive director of Mission Mississippi, a Jackson-based community-development ministry that has drawn together black and white Christians throughout the state that King once described as "sweltering with the heat of oppression."

After hearing the white students cheer on that terrible spring day in 1968, reconciliation was the last thing on Weary's mind. "I had to ask God how to respond," he remembers. "It was around the time that H. Rap Brown, Stokely Carmichael, and other young militant leaders were starting the Black Power movement, and I was tempted to join them. Laughing at Dr. King's death was just like laughing at me—or at the millions of other blacks for whom King labored."

Deep inside, Weary wanted to hate white people, to separate himself from their prejudice. "But then I remembered the heart of Dr. King—responding to hate with love. The Lord brought to my mind that those students were only playing back the tapes that had been recorded in their heads, and I needed to help change the tape."

Weary resolved to "take every opportunity on that campus to help those young minds think differently." He engaged students and professors in discussions about race. He welcomed them to ask him questions about the Negro experience in the South. He rechanneled his anger into building genuine relationships with his white peers.

"I think that is the way Dr. King would have approached it," he says. "King's heart was to look at the broader picture. The small picture is to be angry. The broader, more prophetic picture is to devote yourself to changing the system and changing minds. That was King's great work: He brought the race issue to the table and put it on the minds of the American people. It was not on our agenda before that. But he came along and told us that we're all created in God's image, and that we ought to start looking at each other as brothers and sisters, especially those of us in the Christian church."

Three decades after the death of Martin Luther King, Jr., the race issue is still very much on our minds. Across the nation the news is regularly filled with stories of racial tension and economic disparity between blacks and whites. Divided attitudes on political issues like affirmative action and welfare reform signal abiding strains between the races.

A recent Gallup poll found that, by a margin of 76 percent to 49 percent, more whites than blacks believe blacks have equal opportunities for jobs, education, and housing. It also revealed that blacks are twice as likely as whites to favor affirmative action.

Faced with persistent "wake-up calls," the nation is recognizing the widening gulf. President Clinton's Initiative on Race has sought to get the issues "on the table" but has seen only lackluster results so far. Meanwhile, names such as Rodney King and O. J. Simpson have become symbols for America's racial dilemmas.

Despite our national lack of momentum, Martin Luther King's name has entered the national lexicon, evoking idealistic notions of integration, unity, and brotherhood—or, as King used to say, "the beloved community." King's memory stands as a reminder of how far we have journeyed as well as a disturbing beacon of the great distance left to travel.

For the church, King's legacy is as multifarious as the nation he sought to reconcile. While some revere him as a hero and a prophet of peace, others look on him with disdain, a fact that has been magnified by revelations of King's sexual improprieties and lapses in ethical judgment. Nonetheless, the enduring importance of King's life and achievements have led many evangelicals who once dismissed him as a liberal rabble-rouser now to acknowledge the spiritual validity of his social mission.

Volatile days

Robert Graetz was in a tight spot for a white preacher in Montgomery, Alabama. It was 1955, and the Montgomery bus boycott—an unprecedented effort mounted by the Negro community to protest the city's segregated bus system—was in its embryonic stages. The Negro of Montgomery had long endured the oppression of Jim Crow segregation with relatively few complaints. But with the quiet and unexpected revolt of Rosa Parks, a seamstress who had been arrested when she refused to give up her seat to a white man ("My feet were tired," she later said), the Negro community found itself inspired to take a stand.

As the pastor of the all-Negro Trinity Lutheran Church, Graetz could either remain silent and preserve his privilege as a white man, or forfeit his family peace and safety by identifying himself with his Negro congregation. Graetz, lanky, sandy-haired Caucasian, chose to remain faithful to his Negro flock and became the only white publicly active in the boycott. Graetz, now a 69-year-old interim pastor in central Ohio, explains it: "My family and I had to get involved. If we had remained aloof, our effectiveness as spiritual leaders in the black community would have disintegrated."

His involvement with the bus boycott introduced Graetz to Martin Luther King, then 26 years old and pastor of the middle-class Negro congregation in Montgomery's Dexter Avenue Baptist Church. "From the first time I met him, was impressed," says Graetz. "In terms of his intellect, speaking skills, and ability to motivate people, he was at the top all by himself. He had the remarkable ability to inspire everyone in his presence."

Graetz remembers that King and his wife, Coretta, had only been in Montgomery for a year when he was tapped to lead up the boycott. According to Graetz, King was recruited partly because of his charismatic leadership skills and partly because of his newness to the community—he hadn't made any enemies yet.

Though the boycott was ultimately a success, it was not easy. As the movement picked up momentum, angry segregationists cracked down on the protesters. King's home and those of other Negro leaders were bombed. Graetz was called a "nigger lover" and was frequently awakened at night by the blast of bombs tossed into his yard.

According to Graetz, the whites of the Klan mentality" were a minority (others were just indifferent). But those who were racist made it clear that they would do everything possible to keep Negroes in their place. There was an even smaller number of Montgomery's whites who were "neo-abolitionists"—those who did everything possible to change the plight of blacks. "They were not nearly as outspoken," says Graetz, "because as soon as people spoke up, they were fired from their jobs, or their mortgages were foreclosed. Even a rumor that a white businessman was helping black people was enough to put him out of business."

But King and his movement ultimately secured integrated busing in Montgomery, and blacks throughout the South were buoyed by the triumph. Soon King, along with fellow Montgomery pastor Ralph Abernathy and other Negro Christian leaders, formed the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), a national civil-rights organization. "The thing that is often overlooked is that the civil-rights movement was a church movement," observes Graetz. "The leaders were pastors, and the mass meetings were church services, with prayers, hymns, sermons, and offerings."

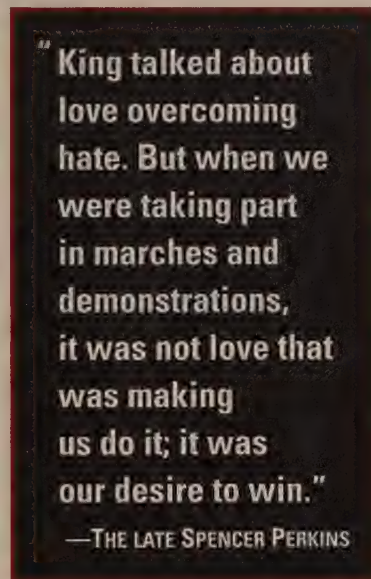

Church as conscience

The son, grandson, and great-grandson of Atlanta preachers, King was raised under the religious pieties of the black Baptist church. "King came out of a very fundamental, evangelical church," explains H. Malcolm Newton, director of urban studies at Denver Seminary. "They taught the Bible at Ebenezer Baptist Church [in Atlanta]. That was his roots."

King's intellectual curiosity and desire to understand the very unchristian race situation in the South (combined with his education at liberal northern seminaries) compelled him to ask questions that would stretch his theology far beyond fundamentalism. Nonetheless, on a practical level, King's Baptist heritage always shone through. "In the quiet recesses of my heart," he often said, "I am fundamentally a clergyman, a Baptist preacher."

It was no accident that an effort as socially positive as the civil-rights movement began in the church, says noted New York pastor Suzan Johnson Cook, a member of President Clinton's Racial Advisory Board. "Martin Luther King proved that our faith and our struggle should never be separate. Faith and struggle—when coupled—make us more effective leaders."

"Dr. King taught us that Christianity could be a vigorous voice for conscience in this nation," adds Robert Franklin, president of the Interdenominational Theological Center, an ecumenical coalition of mostly African-American seminaries in Atlanta. "He showed us that the church did not have to marginalize itself. That it could play a major and necessary role in the public square."

In August 1963, King's movement organized its massive March on Washington, the event that begat the legendary

"I Have a Dream" speech and represented the pinnacle of his fame. A Nobel Peace Prize came in 1964. And there were rousing legislative victories as well, such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

King's political efforts received criticism from white religious leaders from both conservative and liberal circles. His famous "Letter from a Birmingham Jail" was actually a passionate response to eight "moderate" clergymen in Alabama who saw King's continued use of nonviolent resistance as "unwise" and encouraged him to let the fight for integration continue in the local and federal courts. Unlike those clergymen, King could not fathom a separation between his faith and politics. He wrote:

In the midst of a mighty struggle to rid our nation of racial and economic injustice, I have heard so many ministers say, "Those are social issues with which the gospel has no real concern," and I have watched so many churches commit themselves to a completely otherworldly religion which made a strange distinction between body and soul, the sacred and the secular.

The price of protest

On a steamy July evening in 1967, James Earl Massey's plane touched down at the Detroit Metropolitan Airport. Massey, then the senior pastor of Detroit's Metropolitan Church of God, had been attending a clergy convention when one of the worst urban riots in U.S. history erupted in the Motor City. Incessant gunfire filled the evenings, rocks and bricks bashed downtown windows, storefronts were looted of their goods, flames consumed entire city blocks. When it was over, 43 lives and $50 million in property damage had been the cost.

To get home, Massey had to drive through the riot zone. He made it safely, but the biggest challenge still lay ahead for Massey and other leading Detroit ministers who began working to restore peace to their tortured city. "Our church became an outpost for reaching out to people who had lost their homes to fires or had no food because stores had been destroyed." And Detroit was not alone. Racial uprisings had recently erupted in other cities as well—Los Angeles, Harlem, Cincinnati, and several others.

The urban riots were an ugly symptom of the growing spirit of despair that had gripped the Negroes of many northern cities. "There was a lack of jobs and a growing social dissatisfaction," remembers Massey. "With the rise in automation at factories, there were a lot of layoffs, and blacks were feeling the severity of the pinch far more than others."

Although King's civil-rights endeavors had made strides against racism and Jim Crow in the South, issues like poverty, unemployment, and racial discrimination were raging out of control in the North. As a result, younger members of the broader civil-rights movement grew impatient. Leaders of groups such as the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) tossed aside King's "ineffective" nonviolent strategies in favor of more radical "black power" tactics. Malcolm X had been killed in 1965, but the Black Muslim movement continued to win converts in the inner cities. In 1966, SNCC leader Stokely Carmichael vowed never again to "take a beating without hitting back." King, though troubled, understood what drove the militant factions. "The Black Power slogan did not spring full grown from the head of some philosophical Zeus," he said. "It was born from the wounds of despair and disappointment." Nevertheless, black power did not understand King. Massey observes, "King was being looked upon by black militants as an 'Uncle Tom.'"

Massey, now 68, is dean emeritus and professor at large of the Anderson University School of Theology (Ind.) and interim dean of the chapel at Tuskegee University in Alabama. With his neatly trimmed mustache and stately demeanor, Massey was sometimes said to resemble his friend Martin King. He often spent time with King during his trips to Detroit and was aware of his distress and self-doubt over the fragmenting civil-rights scene. Massey points out that, although King remained committed to methods of nonviolence, he was making a clear shift in his rhetoric. "He had moved on to speaking out strongly against poverty and America's participation in the Vietnam War," recalls Massey. "He was, in fact, sounding quite radical."

He wrote in his last book, Where Do We Go from Here: Chaos or Community?: "Whites, it must frankly be said, are not putting in a mass effort to re-educate themselves out of their racial ignorance. . . . It is an aspect of their sense of superiority that the white people of America believe they have so little to learn."

Despite his personal struggles, in early 1968 King was working to organize a massive Poor People's Campaign in Washington for both Negroes and whites. In late March, he arrived in Memphis to support a Negro sanitation workers' strike. His popularity had long since waned. FBI director J. Edgar Hoover (and others) fancied him a "Communist," and for many white Americans, Martin Luther King and urban unrest had become synonymous. The anger and hostility he had been encountering at different protest events, particularly in the large cities, began visibly to erode King's spirit. Says Massey, "In the pictures of him marching in Memphis, you can see the grimmest look on his face. He was very tense. And the speech he gave the night before his death reveals how much he was expecting hostility to rise against him."

"Evangelicals should the right thing to do."

—J. C. WATTS

On the night of April 3, a violent thunderstorm drenched Memphis as a somber-looking Martin Luther King took the stage at the Mason Temple (denominational headquarters of the Church of God in Christ). Despite the furious storm, an enthusiastic crowd of 2,000 people had gathered to hear King deliver what would become his final speech. After an impassioned appeal to the audience to continue the work the movement had begun, King's address concluded on an eerie note. "We've got some difficult days ahead," he preached. "But it doesn't matter with me now. Because I've been to the mountaintop. . . . Like anybody, I would like to live a long life. . . . But I'm not concerned about that now. I just want to do God's will. And he's allowed me to go up to the mountain. And I've looked over. And I've seen the promised land. I may not get there with you. But I want you to know tonight, that we, as a people, will get to the promised land."

The next evening the 39-year-old preacher was shot down as he stood on the second-floor balcony of Memphis's Lorraine Motel.

Massey remembers being at a Detroit television studio that night with his church choir to record a local broadcast for the following Sunday. "While we were preparing to tape, the studio announcer called me aside and told me the news. My heart sank. I didn't tell the choir until after the taping, because I knew they'd be too upset to sing. After King's death, something in me just died."

Something died within the Negro community as well. King's assassination sparked riots in 125 cities, which led to 21,270 arrests and 46 deaths.

Just not getting it

In September 1968, five months later Glen Kehrein, a white senior from Moody Bible Institute, was on a student retreat at the Green Lake Assembly Grounds, an American Baptist camping and convention center in Wisconsin.

Sharing the huge convention ground with Moody that year were Ralph Abernathy, Jesse Jackson, and other leaders from the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. The SCLC had been turned upside-down since the murder of King, and it was time to pause and take account of the organization's future.

Kehrein was familiar with a few of the SCLC's surviving leaders, but King had intrigued him the most. He had heard about King's reputation as a "Communist" and troublemaker, and Christian leaders had warned him about the dangerous theology contained in King's "social gospel." Kehrein didn't know what to believe. After King's murder, the streets of Chicago had turned into a war zone. The sounds, sights, and aromas of sniper fire, burning buildings, and armed National Guardsmen were fresh in his mind. Even the relationships between black and white students at Moody seemed to carry some underlying strain. "I saw the racial divide vividly in the dorm when King's shooting was announced," Kehrein recalls. "There was a completely different reaction between the blacks and whites. It was not that dissimilar from the conflicting reactions that came after the O. J. Simpson verdict. We definitely were not on the same page."

In Wisconsin, Kehrein wanted to put those disturbing memories out of his head. But he somehow knew they were matters he needed to confront. He was hopeful when his professor announced "In the pictures of him marching, you can see he was very tense. His speech the night before his death reveals how much he was expecting hostility to rise against him."

—JAMES EARL MASSEY

"There's danger of only seeing him as a dreamer [because] we too easily let ourselves off the hook from dealing with the realities that he was dealing with."

—CHERYL SANDERS

"I now understand the black community's huge public catharsis of anger and frustration and hopelessness that followed King's assassination."

—GLEN KEHREIN

hat Ralph Abernathy had agreed to share a few words with the Moody students, that perhaps King's closest colleague would be able to put some context to his confusion about race in America. "Dr. Abernathy completed his talk and entertained questions from my class. But with all that history in the room, and all that had transpired in the civil-rights movement over the last 10 years, the majority of questions we ended up asking him were about his personal salvation and his understanding of the conservative tenets of evangelical doctrine." Kehrein was stupefied. "Dr. Abernathy was gracious and attempted to accommodate all our questions, but we were clueless. I think our narrow focus said a lot about the evangelical mindset during that era."

Thirty years after the incident at Green Lake, Glen Kehrein is the executive director of Circle Urban Ministries on Chicago's West Side. Through years of ministry in the inner city and committed relationships across racial lines, Kehrein has worked out much of the angst he felt as a Moody student. "I now understand the black community's huge public catharsis of anger and frustration and hopelessness that followed King's assassination," he says. "While I knew the white community's response to King was not a good measure of the man, back then I wasn't astute enough to fully grasp what was going on among African Americans. And I think many white evangelicals have been on a similar journey since King's death."

"White evangelicals were, for the most part, absent during the civil-rights struggle," admits National Association of Evangelicals (NAE) president Don Argue. Since assuming the NAE helm three years ago, Argue, a white Assemblies of God minister, has worked hard to forge relationships between black and white Christians, spearheading joint meetings between his group and the National Black Evangelical Association (NBEA), and assigning blacks to key positions in his organization. But he realizes the road to strong relationships will be a long and delicate one. According to Argue, white evangelicals missed their golden opportunity the first time. "When African Americans had their Moses in the person of Martin Luther King, we were either indifferent or, in some cases, critical and hostile toward what was happening."

Congressman J. C. Watts agrees. "We should have had more evangelical churches willing to be involved in the civil-rights movement during its heyday," says Watts. "Evangelicals should have been involved simply because it was the right thing to do. If there's an injustice against my fellow man, I have an obligation to say it's wrong, not as a politician but as a Christian."

Watts, the only black Republican in Congress (R-Okla.) and an ordained Baptist minister, speaks freely of his affinity for King, which is indicative of the evolution of King's legacy since his death. Today, conservatives from both the political and religious realms talk unashamedly of the positive contributions of the slain civil-rights leader. However, in King's day, his nonviolent resistance and ambiguous theology were considered suspect. Even evangelist Billy Graham, who since 1953 had worked to desegregate his crusades and had recruited Negro evangelist Howard O. Jones to his team in 1957, was reticent to cast his wholehearted support to King's movement. "Some extreme Negro leaders are going too far and too fast," Graham wrote in 1960. "Only the supernatural love of God through changed men can solve this burning question."

But King saw his "social gospel" as a natural outworking of God's "supernatural love." He told Playboy magazine in 1965, "The essence of the Epistles of Paul is that Christians should rejoice at being deemed worthy to suffer for what they believe. The projection of a social gospel, in my opinion, is the true witness of a Christian life. . . . The church once changed society. It was then a thermostat of society. But today I feel that too much of the church is merely a thermometer, which measures rather than molds popular opinion."

In today's hostile climate of clashing ideologies, King would be considered "politically incorrect," says Congressman Watts. "Today people would say to Dr. King, 'No, no, keep your religious beliefs out of politics—remember the separation of church and state.' But everything Dr. King stood for was because of his faith. His faith transcended race and politics."

On the other hand, at least a few Christian thinkers are not convinced of the religious purity of King's public message. According to the late Spencer Perkins,

Breaking the Black/White Stalemate

Jesse Miranda and William Pannell discuss the next step in racial reconciliation.

Jesse Miranda and William Pannell often find themselves the lone representatives of their ethnic groups on evangelical boards and on speakers' platforms. Perhaps, they suggest, it represents the current state of race relations: different ethnic groups and the majority white community have made contact with each other, but as mere aliens visiting one another from far-off planets. What does it take to transform these encouraging but often facile alien encounters into true Christian relationship? The answers are complex. But because Miranda and Pannell have lived in both the white evangelical world as well as the Hispanic and African-American evangelical worlds respectively, their insights are especially worth hearing.

Jesse Miranda is head of the Alianza de Ministerios Evangelicos Nacionales, a national alliance of Hispanic evangelical ministries best known as AMEN, and is associate dean for urban and multicultural affairs for the Haggard Graduate School of Theology at Azusa Pacific University. He also serves on the board of Promise Keepers and is an executive presbyter for the Assemblies of God. Bill Pannell is professor of preaching and dean of the chapel at Fuller Theological Seminary and serves on the Taylor University board. He is also the author of a number of books, including The Coming Race Wars? (Zondervan). They met in Pasadena for this discussion, moderated by CT's Kevin D. Miller.

How would you evaluate the current state of racial reconciliation in the church?

Miranda: I was watching a cable television station that was carrying a meeting of evangelicals on racial reconciliation. I was excited to see this demonstration of Christian unity. But then my phone rang, and a Hispanic leader on the other end asked if I was watching this. When I told him I was, he asked, "Is your TV in black and white? Because mine is; it looks like a rerun from the 1960s. Why aren't we part of this discussion?"

As it turns out, there have been five national high-profile meetings on racial reconciliation since 1994, conducted by evangelical, Pentecostal, and mainline groups. All have been between black and white participants. Another meeting, between the National Black Evangelical Association and the National Association of Evangelicals, is scheduled for 1999. This makes me think of what David Atencio, a Hispanic minister and educator, has said: "If this is as far as reconciliation meetings go in the American church in terms of inclusivity, then the effort toward reconciliation will not only be limited, but limiting as well." One of the reasons we began AMEN is to provide a point of contact for dialogue on this and other issues.

But isn't there a priority to the black/white reconciliation effort given the history of slavery? In your book Race Wars, Bill, you write, "For white American Christians, this issue at gut level and historically is still primarily an issue between African Americans and Euro Americans." How so?

Pannell: For one, the history of whites enslaving blacks does give their conversation a special place in the dialogue on reconciliation, making it something of a family feud. I also think the racial issue became focused as a black-and-white issue because the most objectionable thing in white society from early days on was blackness—not ethnicity, not culture—but color. That

King's theme of nonviolence and love was probably more a matter of pragmatism than faith. "Like Gandhi, King used it as a strategy to win a battle when the power and numbers were not on his side," said Perkins. "King talked about love overcoming hate. But in my own experience, when we were taking part in marches and demonstrations, it was not love that was making us do it; it was our desire to win."

Eugene Rivers, pastor of inner-city Boston's Azusa Christian Community and an outspoken black voice on matters of race in America, believes King's non-violent methods were outcroppings of the man's political savvy. "King understood that you could not successfully win the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act by appealing to the historical grievances of black people," he says. "So the moral pageantry of the 'beloved community' was tactically the only way to secure those victories."

Dolphus Weary is less cynical about King's motives. For Weary, Martin Luther King was precisely the kind of preacher southern blacks needed. "I used to see many preachers being exploitative of the black community," he says. "They would say stuff like, 'It's OK that you're going into the back door of restaurants. It's OK that you're going to second-class schools. It's OK that you're the last hired and the first fired. Because one day you're going to heaven, and everything will be all right.' But then King came along and said, 'No! You're not a second-class citizen. God is concerned about you right now. Go vote. Go stand up for your rights.' It was what we needed to hear."

White evangelicals should have borne witness to the truth of the gospel by standing with their black brothers and sisters and opposing racist terrorism against black churches, observes Rivers. He adds that conservative evangelicalism can only blame itself for the liberalism in King's theology since in his day black were not welcomed at evangelical colleges and seminaries. "White evangelicals blew an opportunity to shape the intellectual and moral development of King; and an entire generation of church-based civil-rights leaders," says Rivers.

Despite their tardiness, Kehrein knows evangelicals have matured in their view of King. "For the most part, evangelical today no longer have the 'social gospel' concern. They have come to see that the gospel must have social implications and have recognized the great contribution of King and other civil-rights pioneers."

Clearly it is a new day among white evangelicals. This decade alone has witnessed groups as diverse as Pentecostal Southern Baptists, and the Promise Keepers offering public repentance for past racial transgressions. Nonetheless, NAE's Argue believes there remains still prevails. For example, if darker complexioned Puerto Ricans come to the United States, they face greater discrimination than do lighter complexioned Puerto Ricans, even though they are of the same ethnicity. Ours is a society that talks of democracy while behaving as if were a pigment-ocracy.

Miranda: Yes, it is a "family feud," but you must remember we are part of that family. What today is the southwestern United States was Mexico. This means that my Mexican-American father's ancestors were here before Texas or California were even states. And my mother's ancestors, who go back to the Spanish Conquistadors, have a history here that precedes both Anglo and African presence on the continent.

Pannell: But even in the Hispanic community this pigment-ocracy can be seen in the fact that only in recent years have certain Latino professionals of a lighter complexion been willing to finally admit that they are Latinos and begin using Latino names. Black folks never could pass easily as nonblack.

The one group of people who do not like to think of themselves as ethnic are white folks. Here at Fuller Seminary we can talk about multi-ethnics, but the white community, including professors and administrators, don't think of themselves as ethnic people or as having an ethnic theology. When people from, say, Russia come here, they get off the plane, and it doesn't take them very long to know that they're going to survive here in terms of upward mobility and power—not by being Russian Americans, but by being white Americans.

Miranda: I agree that blackness has been a deficit. There are persistent inability among white evangelicals to comprehend the race issue.

"Whenever I go to a black Christian gathering, I find that the subject of racism is always on the agenda, and it's near the top. They're not whining or complaining, but they are deeply concerned," explains Argue. "On the other hand, you go to a white meeting and very rarely, if ever, is racism on the agenda. I've come to the conclusion that it's because African Americans deal with racism on an ongoing basis. They have to justify who they are when they cash a check more often than a white person does."

What of the Dream?

In 1963 on a jetliner zooming from Atlanta to Los Angeles, Martin Luther King sat quietly, peering outside from his window seat. He was drinking in the view of the serene Appalachian Mountains below when the plane suddenly bounced and jerked in a fit of turbulence. King looked up from his pillow, flashed a smile at the Time magazine reporter seated beside him and said, "I guess that's Birmingham down below."

Birmingham was turbulent territory then. King called the city the greatest stronghold of Jim Crow in the South.

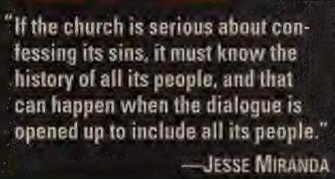

Today, if King were to fly over Birmingham, he would experience friendlier skies. In a city once governed by white supremacists, there is now an African-American mayor. In the downtown district, not far from where attack dogs and fire hoses once assailed nonviolent protesters, there stands the Civil Rights Institute. Inside this sobering memorial of a not-so-distant America, visitors can review the artifacts of the Birmingham revolution and actually explore the jail cell that housed King during his famous imprisonment.

what we call Afro Latinos who purposefully speak Spanish to avoid being thought of as African American. This gives them a leg up on the social ladder.

But isn't it time we move beyond the superficial definition of color? Even Martin Luther King, Jr., did not stop at blackness. He never denied it, but he pointed to something deeper—the content of character. I'm saying that Christians, at least, should see the issue of racial reconciliation as a question of human dignity and identity. This opens the conversation up to include other ethnic groups that have suffered indignities.

In many ways, African Americans and Mexican Americans have strong reasons to be in direct dialogue because of our shared experiences of discrimination. Mexican Americans experience a double standard of business people pulling them in to do their manual labor while politicians push them away with pro-in a low-income neighborhood near the Birmingham airport, stands a small church building, surrounded by rows of public-housing projects. The sign out front reads: DOERS OF THE WORD CHURCH. And the members of the interracial congregation of 150, on any given day, can be seen side-by-side serving the hungry and homeless from their church-run soup kitchen. On Sunday mornings, the half-black, half-white body of believers celebrates their common bond in Christ during an exuberant, cross-cultural worship service. The little church seems a million protest marches away from the Jim Crow spirit that stifled the community in Martin Luther King's day. According to Arthur Johnson, the African-American senior pastor of Doers of the Word, his church is a testament to the enduring power of King's vision.

"Dr. King's dream of his children 'not being judged by the color of their skin positions and laws. Like Native Americans, we live with unresolved land grants and thousands of broken treaties. My wife's grandfather died believing that he had property because he had a title, but it was never honored. Hispanics are the fruit basket of our nation, and yet others don't seem to care that we struggle with low wages and die from the environmental hazards that come with these jobs. So all of these things, I think, are matters that need to be reconciled in society and in the church. If the church is serious about reconciling and confessing its sins, it must know the history of all its people, and that can happen when the dialogue is opened up to include all its people.

Pannell: To talk reconciliation among people anywhere in the world forces us to talk about power and the relationship between reconciliation and justice. There is a sense in which the struggles that we can now identify as beginning in the sixties were simply a continuation of struggles that never did get resolved in significant ways as Euro Americans continued moving in conquest across the face of what is now the United States. Wherever they went, these kinds of subjugations and injustices took place—against Native Americans, Hispanics, and later Asian Americans.

It's not that whites are the only people in the world who do this. But a fact of human nature is that when people have power and decide to use it, it most frequently comes across as oppression. So a common mistake has been to talk about reconciliation in isolation from injustice. The pastors who gave leadership to the civil-rights movement saw that the core of the issue theologically was righteousness and justice, and that without those there would be no reconciliation.

Miranda: Bill, one small example of how easy it is to talk about reconciliation while failing to base it in justice is a story your former student Paul told us. He and his father, both of whom are Hispanic, went to the Atlanta conference of Promise Keepers, which had a strong message on reconciliation. Afterwards, the guys started hugging each other, and a long row of Anglos lined up to hug Paul, but not his father.

Paul wasn't sure what he was reconciling about, and he was puzzled why they were ignoring his father. Then it dawned on him that it was because his skin was darker than his father's. What's ironic is that it was Paul's father who could have told the stories of riding in the backs of buses and drinking from fountains labeled "Mexicans only." He was the one carrying the pain, but he was ignored because he wasn't "visible." I'm saying that true reconciliation must be more than meets the eye. A focus on skin color is not a focus on the total person.

Jesse, you have said that the Exodus story may have to give way to the Samaritan story. What do you mean by that?

Miranda: When Jesus talked with the Samaritan woman at the well, he was bringing his gospel to a mixed race that didn't fit the traditional Jew/Gentile paradigm. Jesus' action represents a missiological shift, a reversal in thought categories from a provincial identity to a global community. It is the fulfillment of Jesus' words in Matthew 12:49 that "obedience is thicker than blood" (The Message). Obedience and empowerment, not ethnic loyalty or domination, are the defining characteristics of God's people.

Pannell: If we do move from Exodus to Samaria, it becomes even more risky because Samaria is about a woman. It seems to me that what Jesus taught us by going to Samaria was not so much a movement over against the Exodus so much as it was breaking into a new frontier, an extension of the implications of the Exodus experience to be much more inclusive. And the radical breakthrough was the inclusivity in the kingdom.

Miranda: I want to be careful here to say that by suggesting the priority of the Samaritan story I am not negating the relevance of the Exodus story. Latinos, like African Americans, use that image as a lesson on liberation.

Pannell: Almost all oppressed peoples do, which is why I think you are right in suggesting the need for a dialogue be-but by the content of their character'—we're living that out every day," says Johnson. "Eleven o'clock Sunday morning at Doers of the Word is definitely not 'the most segregated hour in America.'"

So if Martin Luther King's Dream of an integrated and benevolent society is the ideal by which Christians and the nation should measure their progress in race relations, how are we doing?

Johnson's congregation seems to be an exception. Though an increasing number of U.S. congregations have become intentionally cross-cultural, in many ways local churches are America's final frontier of segregated institutions. "The church is segregated now because that's what we like," said Perkins. "In King's era, churches were segregated because whites didn't want to be around blacks. Now it's two-sided. Today we both choose to be separate."

But Rivers doesn't think that is necessarily a bad thing. In fact, Rivers, who regularly raises eyebrows with his unsympathetic views regarding King, argues that King's perspective on integration was too idealistic. He explains: "King's theological and racial liberalism gave inadequate attention to the primacy of culture, tradition, and history. The truth is, both blacks and whites identify with their particular traditions—and that's not wrong. It only becomes wrong when it promotes injustice." For Rivers, the "remarkable irony" is that King never sought to desegregate black churches. "How is it that the apostle of integration never did this?" Rivers asks. "My sense is that he understood that it was not in the best interest of black preachers to surrender their power by desegregating black churches."

Perkins, late son of racial-reconciliation pioneer John Perkins, disagreed with Rivers. "Being segregated is a weakness of the church. Everybody is comfortable being around their own kind. But that type of thinking puts comfort and culture over Christ."

Robert Franklin, of the Interdenominational Theological Center, says he is "cautiously optimistic." However, Franklin thinks the most pressing racial matters lie in the "institutional" domain. "When one looks at the expansion of the black middle class and the ongoing dismantling of racist legislation and customs throughout the culture, we have to acknowledge that we've come a long way in a short period of time," he says. "But when one looks at the disparate economic culture between blacks and whites and at corporate boardrooms where there is a relatively small number of people of color and women, it's clear that we're still lagging."

Rivers is less generous: "Much of the current race-relations discourse, like what happens at Promise Keepers, substitutbetween groups like Hispanics and African Americans that hold his in common.

Does the church really care about racial reconciliation?

Pannell: Sometimes I feel black people are the only ones who really give a fig about reconciliation. Other ethnic groups have expressed very little interest. The initiative for these sorts of things doesn't usually come out of the white community, either. Go down to the Christian booksellers convention and look at what people are reading and writing and publishing—the stuff that sells—and you will find there are no bestsellers written by white people on the subject. And so I'm saying, Are we, the black community, nuts?

But then I hear the Holy Spirit say, "Pannell, I didn't seek your counsel. I didn't ask you for permission to do anything. You're not in charge here. This is the agenda. This is the thing for which my Son gave his life. I gave him up for this—for reconciliation. This is not an option. This is not an elective." And so I get called back to it again.

One thing that has excited me in this conversation is learning here is a national Hispanic evangelical association. I hadn't ever heard of AMEN! Now we've got a point of reference that I never knew was there. What are the other points of reference out there that we don't know about? Is there a comparable move among Native Americans? Is there a comparable move among the Asian community? I know, of course, any number of Asians who are evangelicals. But how do we find each other in ways that suggest an evangelical movement beyond where we are now that can demonstrate that the issue of reconciliation is not a fad, doesn't depend on getting 6 million guys in a stadium some place?

Miranda: I think you are right in saying other ethnic groups typically show little interest in reconciliation, because their interests go beyond what you call pigmentocracy. This is true of much of the Hispanic community, many of whom are more interested in insulation than reconciliation. However, there is some interest among Latinos from different backgrounds to reconcile the strong ill will that exists among and between them. That is why AMEN came to exist.

But generally speaking, I think many Hispanics wonder what good there is in joining a black/white dialogue that was begun in 1776 and was vigorously resurrected in 1960s—but still is nowhere close to being resolved. Who are we to come in and try to make the issues more complex and probably mix things up? We are better off staying on the sidelines and watching to see if there can be any real resolution or progress. Many wonder what price would be paid to get into that dialogue. Often the result is whites defining blacks, so we'd rather remain free and define ourselves.

Also, I think evangelical Hispanics are reticent to join a dialogue that feels foreign to us in the sense that it is aimed more at truth than at the Latino ideal of relationship. Blacks and whites confront to get to "the bottom of the issue," while Hispanics tend to avoid the issues if it will save face. Perhaps it's because we come out of a Latin Catholic ethos as compared to the Protestant ethos that whites and blacks speak from.

And yet, with you, I agree that disengagement is not the Christian way. Hispanics owe a lot to the black community for taking up the baton of human rights and of civil rights. It isn't the Christian way to take a free ride or to sit back and see how things do or don't get worked out. Whatever the consequences, we need to get into the dialogue, and perhaps we can bring something to the table that would help us all work through the differences of skin pigmentation, culture, or history.

Pannell: One of the reasons Christian attempts to speak about reconciliation in the broader culture are not taken seriously is because the Christian movement itself has demonstrated such little commitment to it. Before there can be any meaningful reconciliation, evangelicals who are black, white, Korean, or Hispanic must once and for all come to terms with this mandate of our God that this is the core of the curriculum. To be a Christian is to be in the ministry of reconciliation. CT fundamentalist hufgests for the kind of deep, substantive dialogue that has a genuine impact on institutional decisions and public policy. Too much of the reconciliation rhetoric of white evangelicals focuses on interpersonal piety without any radically biblical conception of racial justice."

Oberlin College religion professor Albert G. Miller believes the church has a watered-down understanding of King's vision. "I think we are stuck in our image of King at the 1963 March on Washington," he says. "The 'I Have a Dream' King was a kinder, gentler King. There was a more complicated man that evolved after that point who was very frustrated with what he saw with the limited progress of blacks. In his latter days, King was not just protesting for blacks to eat at the lunch counter, but for blacks to have employment at the lunch counter and to own it."

Cheryl Sanders, professor of Christian Ethics at Howard University and senior pastor of Washington's Third Street Church of God, concurs. "The problem with the Dream language is that it draws attention away from the reality of what King was speaking about throughout his life. There's a danger of only seeing him as a dreamer, and if we only see him as a dreamer, we too easily let ourselves off the hook from dealing with the realities that he was dealing with."

Toward the end of his life, King returned to his Baptist theological roots, "stripping himself . . . of Protestant liberalism's pieties," writes Willy Jennings in BOOKS & CULTURE (March/April 1998), emphasizing the words of Jesus and the coming judgment.

Denver Seminary's Malcolm Newton adds: "King and the other Christians of the civil-rights movement put their lives on the line. Protesting, marching, getting bombed and lynched and thrown into jail hundreds of times for the sake of biblical justice. That's a legacy that King left for us, and the church hasn't grabbed on to it yet."

Still, others are guardedly encouraged. "Compared to where we were, I think we've done very well," says Mission Mississippi's Weary. "People are talking today who haven't talked in a long time. There's still a long way to go, but at least we're talking about it."

In the meantime, away from the din of philosophical debates and unfulfilled hopes, the everyday business of coexisting together must go on. And one senses there might be something to learn from unheralded efforts like Arthur Johnson's Birmingham contingent. Says Johnson: "I know we've still got a lot of issues to work through, but as long as we're pursuing the Dream, I believe God is pleased." CT

Still Wrestling with the Devil

A visit with Jimmy Swaggart ten years after his fall.

The Family Life Center lies on the edge of Baton Rouge just down the road from the newly opened Mall of Louisiana. The parking lot for the shopping mall is burgeoning on a Sunday, while the acres of parking for the Family Life Center are nearly vacant. Such a contrast might occasion yet another commentary on spiritual apathy, misplaced priorities, and the false gods of consumerism, until one remembers that the preacher behind the pulpit at the Family Life Center on this Sunday—as well as most Sundays—is a man named Jimmy Swaggart.

To suggest that Swaggart is behind the pulpit, however, is somewhat misleading; he has never submitted easily to the constraints of pulpits—or, for that matter, to any other conventional boundaries. Instead, he bobs and weaves and shouts and cries and spins his own magic. “Preaching is like an orchestra,” Swaggart told me. “You have to be loud one moment and quiet the next. You’ve got to keep the people’s attention. You’ve got to keep the people’s attention.” Throughout a raucous and controversial career now in its fourth decade, Jimmy Swaggart has rarely had trouble keeping people’s attention.

Not welcome here

Despite the dearth of congregants, my presence at Family Life Center was not entirely welcome. I had made the mistake of chatting with the women at the welcome booth and, in the process, disclosed naïvely that I was in town to write an article about Jimmy Swaggart Ministries ten years after his celebrated—and very public—downfall. I had just settled into my seat in the sanctuary, already awash in klieg lights, when one of the ushers, dressed in a burgundy sport coat, sat down beside me. “I understand you’re a reporter,” he said. I allowed that he was close enough. “First of all,” he barked, “no pictures in here.”

As I looked around, I understood why. The last time I had seen Swaggart on television, which was several years ago, it had occurred to me that all the camera angles had been rather narrow, suggesting that they were trying to cover up for the fact that the congregation was small. Indeed, the entire wrap-around balcony of the octagonal building was closed, shrouded in darkness, and huge sections of the main floor had been cordoned off by dark, burgundy curtains, which matched the carpeting and the blazers worn by the ushers. “And the other thing,” the usher announced brusquely, “I’m pretty sure Don and Jimmy don’t want you here. In fact, I’ll check with Donnie right now.”

Within minutes Donnie Swaggart, Jimmy’s son, a stocky man with an athletic build, dressed nattily in a dark, double-breasted suit, came bounding from the backstage area, almost running toward me. “What are you doing here?” he demanded. When I explained that I was writing an article for CHRISTIANITY TODAY, Donnie Swaggart’s eyes flashed.

— RANDALL BALMER —

"I don't like the press," he bellowed. "How come you didn't tell us you were coming?" I explained that I had called the office several times over the preceding weeks to inquire about dates and that I had made no attempt to hide my purpose for visiting. "Well you didn't talk to me," he said, his tone softening slightly.

"Listen, I've seen characters like you before," he continued, resuming the bluster and wagging his finger in my direction, "and you know what? It's the so-called Christians who are the worst." Ten o'clock was fast approaching, and Donnie had to assume his place on the stage. "Just remember," he continued, "blood is thicker than water. Do whatever you want to me, just don't touch my parents or my kids. If you do, I'm coming after you, you understand?"

Although I found these threats more amusing than intimidating—should I expect a knock on the door some night from a couple of thugs with cigarettes dangling from their mouths: "Hey, buster, some preacher fella from Baton Rouge wants to have a little chat with you"?—Donnie Swaggart clearly was paranoid about my presence. Throughout the service he kept stealing glances in my direction. A rather large usher whose name tag read "Bill Wilson" was assigned to follow me, tracking my serpentine movements after the service. Although I managed to lose him a couple of times, he caught up with me, breathing a bit heavily, and resumed his surveillance. When I approached Jimmy Swaggart, who had changed into a turtleneck and was greeting congregants near the stage, Wilson fidgeted nervously but kept his distance.

Swaggart himself couldn't have been more gracious. He is a kind man who, unlike some other "televangelists," is not afraid to meet your eyes. Lest there be any confusion or false pretenses, I informed him immediately of my purpose for visiting Baton Rouge and told him of my admiration for his preaching abilities. The mention of CHRISTIANITY TODAY, however, brought a change in his countenance, not so much anger or defiance, as it had with Donnie, but sadness. "I'm afraid I won't be able to help you," he said, shaking his head. "That magazine has said some pretty hurtful things about me." He shifted his eyes briefly toward the middle distance, then back at me. From the corner of my eye I could see my tail, Bill Wilson, shuffling nervously.

"Listen," Swaggart said kindly, "I'm not always right about this, of course, but I'm pretty good at judging people, and I detect a good spirit about you. But I don't want anything to do with that magazine. In fact," he continued, suddenly laughing, "I don't even want anything good about me going into that magazine!" He grabbed my hand, shook it warmly, and drove home the point. "I'm sorry. If you were writing for the Washington Post," he said, "that might be a different matter."

As I turned away, back toward Bill Wilson, so we could resume meandering around the Family Worship Center, I too was sorry. Jimmy Swaggart is an enormously likable man, and I would have loved to chat for awhile about life and preaching and failure and grace and the many doctrines we held in common, including providence.

Mentoring Jimmy

Little did I know that an affirmation of providence would occur within the hour, but to understand the scale of this theological demonstration I must reveal a mundane personal detail: I rarely eat lunch—once or twice a month, at most, and only when a business or social occasion demands it. As I pulled out of the parking lot at the Family Life Center, however, and drove past the vast array of restaurants on Bluebonnet Avenue, I abruptly decided to pull into a large, well-advertised seafood restaurant.

I wanted to look through Swaggart's autobiography, To Cross a River, which I had just purchased in the bookstore, and, relieved that Bill Wilson and the usher corps had not confiscated my notebook, I wanted to review my notes from the morning.

The hostess seated me at a table next to a fairly large group, headed by none other than a man wearing a gray turtleneck—Jimmy Swaggart. He noticed me almost immediately and, without a moment's hesitation, invited me to join them. I assured him that I had not followed him to the restaurant, but he was unconcerned and introduced me all around—his wife, Frances, his mother-in-law, and a missionary family from South Africa.

Swaggart was relaxed and expansive. Although he dropped out of high school, he is an exceedingly bright, literate, and articulate man. In the course of our conversation he talked about the preachers who had influenced him, A. N. Trotter and John R. Rice, a fundamentalist with whom Swaggart had formed an improbable friendship. "I've preached a lot of his sermons over the years," Swaggart said, citing one of his favorites in particular, whose theme was "all the Devil's apples got worms." He said that he had developed "my own style," but he very much admired the oratorical abilities of Martin Luther King, Jr., E. V. Hill, and "some white guy with a bald head." When I ventured the name Tony Campolo, Swaggart recognized it immediately. "Yeah, that's him! That guy can preach," he said, slapping the table with evident appreciation.

Swaggart's autobiography cites a couple of other preachers as influential in his early years. J. M. Cason, a young evangelist held revival meetings in Swaggart's hometown of Ferriday, Louisiana. He made an impression on Swaggart as "a highly emotional man who cried and preached at the same time."

Another young preacher, Cecil Janway, also played the piano. Swaggart remembers that he "brought life" from the church ragged upright piano, "life which flowed throughout the church building."

To this day, Swaggart opens his services at the keyboard, his right leg thumping up and down in time to the beat. As with many Pentecostal services, the opening songs blend seamlessly one to the next. "There is power in the blood" segues into "Alleluia, fill us afresh today." As the music whips the congregation into a frenzy, Donnie Swaggart claps and hops in time to the beat and then grabs a microphone. "I'm here to serve notice on the Devil today," he exclaims, "there's power in the blood. There's power in the blood of Jesus Christ." The congregation concurs with shouts and applause. "There's a new sheriff in town," Donnie announces. "The Devil has been defeated!" He does a little dance as the music segues back into "Power in the Blood."

After still more music and an exhortation to "give the Lord a big hand," the crowd hushed as a woman in the front row spoke in tongues. Someone from the choir offered an immediate interpretation. Donnie once again grabbed the microphone. "I don't know if you can hear it. The Holy Ghost is saying, 'I want to enlarge your borders here at the Family Worship Center. There's not going to be an empty seat in the house.'"

True confession—sort of

For ten years now, there has been a surfeit of empty seats in the Family Worship Center, which has a capacity of 7,500. The last full house, in fact, gathered to witness the famous confession on February 21, 1988. "I do not plan in any way to whitewash my sin," Swaggart said in the wake of disclosures about having visited a motel room with a prostitute. "I do not call it a mistake, a mendacity. I call it sin." In a soliloquy that was baroque and eloquent at the same time, Swaggart apologized to his wife, his son, and his daughter-in-law.

He apologized to the Assemblies of God, "which helped to bring the gospel to my little beleaguered town, when my family was lost without Jesus, this movement and fellowship that girdles the globe, that has been more instrumental in bringing this gospel through the stygian night of darkness to the far-flung hundreds of millions than maybe any effort in the annals of history." He apologized to the "godly" pastors of the Assemblies of God, to its evangelists and missionaries.

Finally, Swaggart apologized to Jesus, "the one who has saved me and washed me and cleansed me." Swaggart's jaw quivered; rivulets of tears flowed down his cheeks. His eyes turned toward heaven. "I have

God imposed a three-month silence, which Swaggart accepted, the denomination extended the discipline to two full years. Swaggart, however, chose to abide by the Louisiana punishment. He resumed preaching on May 22, 1988, Pentecost Sunday, explaining that "Jesus paid the price" for his sins. Swaggart may have had little choice. Put simply, the scale and the reach of his operations in Baton Rouge and around the world demanded a steady infusion of cash. Donnie was not yet ready to step in—he had neither the experience nor the charisma—and Jimmy recognized that he had to go back on the air in an effort to salvage the various components of his empire.

In retrospect, that decision was probably a miscalculation. "He has isolated himself from those who could have helped eventually restore his ministry with integrity," CHRISTIANITY TODAY opined. "Swaggart was too impatient, too friendly with power, too short-sighted to see beyond his immediate desires and goals."

The General Presbytery of the Assemblies of God defrocked Swaggart for violating the terms of their suspension; Swaggart had burned his bridges with his own denomination. His basic constituency had already eroded, and Swaggart certainly did not help himself with his own recidivism. In 1991 he was art's transgression, few others did.

sinned against you, my Lord, and I would ask that your precious blood would wash and cleanse every stain until it is in the seas of God's forgetfulness, never to be remembered against me."

The performance was vintage Swaggart—complete with anguish and tears and self-flagellation—but if God forgot his transgression, few others did. For Swaggart's many critics, moreover, he had finally received his comeuppance. Swaggart had earlier criticized "pretty-boy preachers," a thinly veiled reference to Jim Bakker, his fellow Assemblies of God minister and rival televangelist. Marvin Gorman, a Pentecostal preacher from New Orleans, had also tangled with Swaggart, and Gorman was the one who produced evidence that Swaggart had entered a Louisiana motel room with a prostitute—not for a sexual liaison, it turns out, but to engage in some sort of voyeurism.

Believers shuddered at the toppling of yet another televangelist, and the media, already in a feeding frenzy in the wake of Bakker's tryst with Jessica Hahn, had a field day. Swaggart became the object of ridicule and derision. He had engaged in something that was portrayed not so much as immoral as it was tawdry. Some commentators made much of the fact that Hahn (after the requisite plastic surgery) appeared in Playboy, while the woman linked with Swaggart appeared in Penthouse.

Swaggart promised to submit to the discipline of the Assemblies of God, with whom he held ordination credentials. He offered what the denomination characterized as a "detailed confession," which demonstrated "true humility and repentance" on Swaggart's part. While the Louisiana District of the Assemblies of stopped by police in Indio, California, while driving with a woman who claimed to be a prostitute. The result was predictable. More scorn, more ridicule, more empty seats.

Fire in his veins

The compound that straddles Bluebonnet Road has a forlorn look to it. With the huge infusions of cash from his television program—Jimmy Swaggart Ministries pulled in $141.6 million in 1986, the last full year before the scandal—Swaggart had built an impressive empire: the massive Family Worship Center, television production facilities, an administrative center for his worldwide operations, and Jimmy Swaggart Bible College across the street.

Most of the flagpoles, each of which once represented a foreign nation where Swaggart maintained a presence, are empty. The fountains are dry, the landscaping neglected and overgrown. At the Bible college, weeds and a chainlink fence surround the shell of what was to be a high-rise dormitory, its construction abruptly halted after the scandal. Only about 45 students attend the school now, Swaggart told me wistfully, a campus built to accommodate hundreds more. The entire scene resembles a fly trapped in amber, frozen in time.

And yet, a decade after the scandal, Swaggart soldiers on. He leaves the piano, steps onto center stage, removes his glasses, and exclaims, "I don't know about you, but I'm happy this morning!" He initiates a reprise of "I've got the Holy Ghost down in my heart, just like the Bible says," and then, referring to a recent downturn in the financial markets, remarks: "If you get your joy out of Wall Street, well, you got quite a jolt a couple of weeks ago." He invites members of the congregation to come forward for healing. As the choir and the congregation sing "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty," Swaggart, his son, and several elders pray for each one. Swaggart took particular compassion on a man who was badly deformed. "Lord, touch my brother," he cried, with his hands on the man's forehead, "from the top of his head to the soles of his feet."

Divine healing has always been a central tenet of Swaggart's ministry. The death of his baby brother, Donnie, when Jimmy was only four made a deep impression on him. While preaching his first revival in Sterlington, Louisiana, Swaggart came down with pneumonia (the same illness that had felled his brother). Swaggart went to the hospital but left after a couple of days, still burning with fever. He fell into a deep depression. "Dark, gloomy thoughts roamed through my mind," Swaggart recalled. "It seemed as if every demon in hell had crawled out to do battle with me."

He read a passage from the Book of Joshua, with the admonition to be strong and of good courage. "God's healing power surged through my body," Swaggart said. "It was like fire in my veins." He went on to impart his healing gift to others—as well as to the battered, blue Plymouth he used during the early years of his itinerancy.

Down in the bayou

The quickest route from Baton Rouge to Ferriday, Louisiana, is U.S. 61, also known as the Great River Road. It winds north past refineries along the Mississippi River, past antebellum plantations that have been turned into museums, and past sharecroppers' cabins sitting next to their modern counterpart, that peculiarly American oxymoron, the mobile home. Baptist churches outnumber gas stations and restaurants and taverns and just about every other sort of establishment in the piney woods of Mississippi. At Natchez the road connects to U.S. 84 west across the kudzu banks of tracks themselves were removed some years ago.

After driving around town for half an hour, I still hadn't located the Assembly of God that had been organized in 1936 by Pentecostal missionaries Mother Sumrall and her daughter Leonia. When I asked for help in a convenience store, one of the customers interjected, "Oh, I can help you. Jimmy's my cousin." Carolyn Magoun, who later clarified that she was actually Frances's cousin, not Jimmy's, directed me to the First Assembly of God at the end of Texas Avenue. The Swaggart house, she said, had been torn down a long time ago.

When I offered that Jimmy Swaggart has had a rough time in recent years, Magoun agreed. "Yes, he has," she said, shaking her head, "but people just forget that we're all human." She added that when Frances Swaggart grew tired of the media glare during her husband's troubles, she would often slip away to Ferriday and Wisner, her hometown, just up the road.

The tiny clapboard building at the end of Texas Avenue was sagging somewhat, but it sported a fresh coat of white paint. I pulled into the gravel parking lot where Swaggart's uncle, Elmo Lewis, Jerry Lee's father, had pulled his sleek, black Cadillac in the spring of 1958, interrupting a church picnic. Elmo Lewis had just returned from Memphis with the news that Sam Phillips, the producer of Sun Records who had discovered Elvis Presley, Johnny Cash, and Jerry Lee Lewis, had sent for Swaggart. Phillips had heard Swaggart sing and play the piano and found his keyboard style virtually indistinguishable from that of his cousin, Jerry Lee Lewis; he wanted to start a gospel line at Sun, with Swaggart as his first artist.

Swaggart was at that time, in his words, "a smalltime, wrong-side-of-the-tracks Pentecostal preacher" earning $30 a week—in good weeks. He had a wife and a young son and the battered, blue Plymouth. He preached in a $20 Steir suit and a single pair of shoes, while his cousin, known nationally as "the wild man of rock 'n' roll," was pulling in $20,000 a week.

Playing by the book has never been the Mississippi River and back into Louisiana to Ferriday.

When I told Swaggart that I planned to visit Ferriday, he said, "Well, it's still there." The large sign on the edge of town, just past Martin's Auto Shop & Used Tires, reads: Ferriday, La, Visit Our Museum, Home of Jerry Lee Lewis, Howard K. Smith, Mickey Gilley, Peewee Whittaker, Jimmy Swaggart, Ann Boyar Warner.

Ferriday is a town of convenience stores, cinder-block Laundromats, and abandoned houses. Most of the shops along Louisiana Avenue were shuttered years ago, although the hardware store and the pawnshop remain open. Many of the houses in town, not just the mobile homes, sit atop piles of bricks or cinder blocks, testimony to the perils of life on a floodplain. Poverty abounds on both sides of the tracks, although even the Uncle Elmo had left the Cadillac running. The contract were waiting in Memphis, and Swaggart had been scheduled into the recording studio the next morning. Swaggart paused, surveyed the church folk, and said no. "I can't do it," he said finally, and the black Cadillac pulled away.

Swaggart believes that God gave him his musical abilities. After the arrival of Cecil Janway, the young preacher-pianist, to the Assemblies of God church in Ferriday, Swaggart prayed for a miracle. "Lord," I said, "I want you to give me the gift of playing the piano." Swaggart was so fervent that he even attached conditions to the request. "If you give me this talent, I will never use it in the world," he promised, adding, "If I ever go back on this promise, you can paralyze my fingers!" The gift came that very evening, a gift that he tried to refine with lessons from the local band director, but Swaggart quit after four lessons, concluding that "playing by the book was a waste of time."

Playing it by ear

Playing by the book has never been Swaggart's forte. His preaching style is inimitable, and he is a consummate showman. (I often tell students that if they want to appreciate fully Swaggart's artistry, tune him in on television, turn off the sound, and watch his facial expressions and his gesticulations.) At 11:30 on Sunday morning, an hour and a half after the service began, Swaggart announced, "I'm not going to preach long, just enough to get through." He recited his text from memory: "I baptize you with water for repentance. But after me will come one who is more powerful than I, whose sandals I am not fit to carry. He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire" (Matt. 3:11, NIV). He was already weeping. "I know I'm nothing."

He recounted the baptism of John along the "reedy banks" of the River Jordan. Swaggart loosened his necktie. "I believe that Jordan rained with shouts that day," he said. "There's nothing like people getting saved." His voiced cracked. "Forgive my emotion," he said and then launched into a riff: "When people come to God, the drunkard puts down his bottle and the drug addict his drugs!" He recounted how "Jesus came to my house" when Swaggart was five; his parents were converted. "When they got saved," Swaggart exclaimed, "the fighting ended." Behind Swaggart, in the pastors' gallery adjacent to the choir, Donnie Swaggart was sobbing convulsively. "I'm not going to push any more on this message this morning," Swaggart said, after a pause. "Here's what the Holy Ghost tells me to say to you right now," he continued, pacing the stage. "Come to Jesus."

And they came. Maybe not the hundreds, as in years past, but scores. They filed to the front steps, where boxes of tissues had been placed discreetly around the stage. Swaggart had invited them to come for salvation, for healing, for release from the bondage of sin or addiction.

As members of the congregation streamed toward the octagonal stage in response to Swaggart's altar call, a fascinating tableau unfolded. Donnie Swaggart, having dabbed his tears, strode purposefully into the audience, picked out a good-looking young couple, guided them forward, and positioned them ciously. Jimmy Swaggart again opened the service at the piano, while Donnie tried to imitate his father's style. "The Devil does not own this town," he shouted. "He doesn't own this town. He doesn't own this state. He doesn't own this nation."

In show business terms, Donnie Swaggart was dying out there, so his father stepped from behind the piano and, smooth as butter, came to the rescue. After a few remarks about his early days as a preacher he began spontaneously to sing "The Old Rugged Cross." A woman near the stage was slain in the Spirit, caught as she fell backward by a man in a burgundy blazer. "Let me tell you," Swaggart told the congregation, "you'll make it if you hold to that cross." The music shifted to "O, Happy Day" and then "Where Could I Go but to the Lord?" "The crippled man can still go to him," Swaggart declared. "The drunk can still go to him. The lost sinner can still go to him."

Donnie, wearing (honest to God) blue suede shoes—midnight blue loafers to match his shirt and his pocket square—again came to the microphone and this time rose to the occasion. His father, seated behind him, was his biggest cheerleader, offering hearty amens and applause. Donnie, preaching from Numbers 13, proved that he is a competent, even better-than-average preacher, "reading" his audience in good Pentecostal fashion, trying one theme after another until something clicks. That Sunday night, it was his recounting of an interracial revival he had preached recently in Orlando, Florida. "We don't need Farrakhan," he shouted. "We don't need Jesse. We need Jesus!" The congregation cheered. "Racism is destroying this nation," he continued, "but Jesus is the cure."

The soaring rhetoric was a digression, but it worked; he had the attention of the audience. Swaggart then settled back into his theme, that "we are well able" to possess the land. For the younger Swaggart, that meant that the congregation, despite its setbacks in recent years, should move forward in faith. "The Devil took his best shot, but we are well able to go up and possess the land," he said. "At times it doesn't seem like there's many of us, but there's more for us than there are against us." He talked about filling the cavernous Family Worship Center once again, and he even talked about resuming construction on the high-rise dormitory across the street. "Doubt says the church is half-empty, but faith says the church is half-full."

The faithful remnant

In the course of the service, I had noticed a 30-something woman from afar. She had been one of the most enthusiastic participants in the service, arms outstretched, weaving back and forth with her eyes closed. Her name, I learned, was Vickie Whittenburg, and when I asked her why she attended Swaggart's church, she replied that it was "the Word, nothing but the Word." She professed not to be bothered by Swaggart's past transgressions. "It's the anointing, regardless of the sin in one's life," she explained. "It's a gift from God, and God doesn't take it back."

Ralph Walker, an usher, stopped by to join the conversation. "Nobody can preach like Jimmy Swaggart," he said. "I've never known anyone like him. I started listening to him on the radio. I was a heathen. I was just a rank heathen." Walker began attending the church when "it was bulging at the seams," he said, pointing to the empty balcony. "I had to stand at the back of the balcony."

Both Whittenburg and Walker consider themselves a remnant of the faithful. Whittenburg was drawn to Swaggart, in part, because of her passion for the underdog. "He's a fighter," she said. "I've never felt that I wanted anyone to make it as much as him, regardless of any error or failing on his part."

in front of one of the television cameras. He began praying fervently and animatedly. The camera's red light flicked on obligingly, while the couple, especially the man, looked rather bewildered. Midway through the prayer, moreover, Donnie signaled to one of his associates to bring someone else. He moved to another camera and repeated the performance.

Donnie Swaggart clearly is positioning himself for an even greater role in Jimmy Swaggart Ministries. He is the heir apparent, and when his father announced on Sunday morning that Donnie would preach that evening, the son let out a whoop, prompting his father to compare him to a racehorse chomping at the bit.

When I arrived for the six o'clock service, my friend Bill Wilson was waiting for me in the lobby, still eyeing me suspi-

Walker ventured that the downfall happened because Jimmy Swaggart Ministries was getting too big.

Lorraine Thomas had moved with her husband, a preacher (now deceased), to Baton Rouge from Arizona in September 1987, just months before the scandal unfolded. "God said, 'Go there and lift Jimmy up because he's going to go through a great trial,'" she recalled. All three said that they met with ridicule when they told others that they attended Swaggart's church. "Is he still preaching?" friends ask incredulously.

As the klieg lights dimmed and the conversation drew toward a close, Whittenburg asked, "Do you mind if we pray with you over this article?" A small crowd encircled me and joined hands. "Lord, we pray that you would send your Spirit upon this man as he writes this article," Walker intoned. "Help him to remember the things he should remember and forget the things he should forget."

In the decade since the televangelist scandals we have forgotten some of the shame that was heaped upon evangelicalism in the 1980s, but evangelicalism itself, the most resilient and influential movement in American history, has managed to survive, even prosper. I wonder, however, if the fixation on the financial shenanigans and the sexual escapades of the scandals has allowed us to dodge some thorny questions. Surely the transgressions of Bakker and Swaggart were not that much more egregious than Pat Robertson accepting Rupert Murdoch's millions for the sale of the Family Channel, a property that Robertson developed from the tax-deductible contributions of the faithful. A focus on the transgressions of Bakker and Swaggart deflects attention from theological issues surrounding televangelism. The obscene sums of money pouring into the televangelists' coffers is an invitation to abuse, and we can only speculate on how much of that revenue has been diverted from local congregations.

Evangelicalism, with its relative lack of creedal formulas and the absence of strong ecclesiastical structures, moreover, has always been susceptible to the cult of personality, a weakness only magnified by television. Evangelicals once harbored a healthy—though, at times, excessive—suspicion of worldliness, but they too have been infected by the culture of celebrity. Although evangelicals have always been citational in the expression of their beliefs, the fixation on celebrity in the last couple of decades has produced an important shift. Evangelicals once referred directly to the Bible as the basis for their theology, but now, more often than not, the citation has been filtered through the celebrity preacher: "As Dr. Swindoll says . . .," or "As Dr. Schuller says . . .," or "Dr. Dobson believes that. . ."

Finally, while only the most obdurate Luddite would deny that the gospel can be proclaimed over the airwaves, evangelicalism's worship forms, with the overweening emphasis on the sermon and the relative neglect of the sacraments or the church as the body of Christ, has led some viewers to suppose that a Sunday morning in the easy chair might be the rough equivalent of an hour in the pew. Besides, those televangelists, with their high-tech graphics and their cuddly musicians, sure know how to put on a good show!

But no one, not even Swaggart with his remarkable artistry, has found a way to sustain the community of faith over the airwaves. Worship surely must be something more than watching a preacher trying to project bonhomie and intimacy into a television camera. Shouldn't the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation mean something? Jesus took on a fleshly form, after all; he didn't rent satellite time. The gospel itself was flesh and blood, not an image flickering across the television screen, the medium capable of such extraordinary deception. No, the gospel is tactile and visceral, incarnate, the very characteristics we celebrate in Holy Communion. Blessed are the present, Jesus seems to be saying throughout the New Testament. Blessed are the present, for they are here and not absent.

Why Jimmy makes us uncomfortable

Swaggart's sermons and his autobiography are replete with references to the Devil and to darkness. He speaks of being "anointed by the Devil" as a young man, while playing the piano in a competition, and another time when the "darkened, oppressive forces of hell had been unleashed against me." He wrestled with demons luring him to the movie theater and the temptation to follow his cousins, Lewis and Gilley, into the secular music business. But for every account of slipping into dark waters, Swaggart eventually claimed a victory.

"Jerry Lee can go to Sun Records in Memphis, I'm on my way to heaven with a God who supplies all my needs according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus," he declared after a bout of envy at his cousin's wealth. "I didn't know how to explain it, but I knew I had won a great victory over the powers of darkness."

While preaching in Ohio on the camp-meeting circuit many years ago, Swaggart was awakened by a flash flood. The raging waters, he said, nearly swept him and his wife away, but God spared them. "The Devil had tried to take our lives, and I realized the struggles would become more intense as I moved forward with God," Swaggart recalled. "For years to come, I would dream about struggling against that current and almost drowning."

For more than a decade Jimmy Swaggart has been struggling against the current. But when he responds to his critics by saying that "as many scars as I have, another one doesn't really matter," I suspect he's talking about something more than scorn and ridicule and declining revenues. When Swaggart refers to the "stygian night of darkness," the reference is internal as well.

Perhaps that's why Swaggart makes us uncomfortable. All of us wrestle with demons, whether we use that terminology or not. They may or may not be sexual, as with Swaggart, but from time to time we feel ourselves slipping into dark waters, and the undertow seems all too overwhelming. Swaggart, with his tears and his sweat and his tortured confession, seems all too human and, let's face it, we evangelicals prefer our heroes to be anodyne and in control, tidy and triumphant. Swaggart makes us uncomfortable by reminding us of ourselves, but rather than facing our faults, our fallenness, our humanity, it's easier to change the subject and dismiss Swaggart with ridicule. More's the pity, for it is only by gazing into the mirror of our own wretchedness that we begin to comprehend the magnificence of grace.

A decade ago, groping for an explanation for his transgression, Swaggart remarked, "Maybe Jimmy Swaggart has tried to live his entire life as though he was not human." We've known about Swaggart's humanity for a decade now, and when in the course of a sermon he segues into "Amazing grace, how sweet the sound that saved a wretch like me," some would dismiss that as contrived and disingenuous, just another part of his act.

I think he knows whereof he speaks.

Hospice Care Hijacked?

A bottom-line, cost-efficient mentality obscures the movement's original Christian vision.

ART MOORE

In January 1995, a physician diagnosed 50-year-old Cliff Dailey of Atlanta with a rare form of cancer. His doctor offered massive doses of chemotherapy as his only hope. Dailey's severe heart problems, though, lowered his already meager chances of survival to less than 10 percent.

"We knew going into this that there wasn't a great deal that medicine could do," says his widow, Rita. "But it was the only thing we had."

Finally, Dailey's doctor determined that continued chemotherapy would lead to a quicker death, and he recommended two different hospice programs.

Rita Dailey recalls that a representative of one of the hospices met her at the door. "She said, 'We'll help you all we can, and when he's dead, you call us. We'll pick him up.'"

In America's death-denying culture, hospice is struggling to overcome the perception that it is a choice to quit. On the contrary, its advocates assert, hospice is an interdisciplinary program that enables the terminally ill to live to their fullest with the time they have left.

Though the number of hospice programs has grown steadily—17 percent annually during the past five years—Yale University Medical School professor Diane Komp believes that a bottom-line mentality, fostered largely by managed care and Medicare, has "hijacked" the original hospice vision of the movement's Christian founder, Cicely Saunders. Saunders, a London physician, placed the spiritual dimension at the core of an integrated community team of lay volunteers and health-care professionals at Saint Christopher's hospice (CT, Dec. 17, 1990, p. 22).

"The idea that you can fund something by the government and duplicate what happened in London totally underestimates what Saint Christopher's hospice was all about," says Komp.

"The community came together to solve a problem in health care that the health profession, left to our own devices, wasn't doing a good job with," says

Komp, who serves at the Connecticut Hospice, Inc. in Branford, established in 1974 with the help of Saunders as the first hospice in the United States. "Communities of laypeople, doctors, nurses, clergy—even funeral directors in the large communities—came together with a common vision of doing a better job."

The more than 3,000 hospice programs in the United States serve 450,000 patients, according to the most recent statistics of the National Hospice Organization (NHO), an advocacy and membership group based in Washington, D.C.

Hospice researcher Joanne Lynn says no conclusive research exists to determine just how well hospice is doing its job and what effect managed care arrangements have had.

"The NHO puts out a survey in which they measure satisfaction in families, so you know that on the whole there is sort of a glow about things," says Lynn, director of the Center to Improve Care of the Dying, George Washington University in Washington, D.C. "But you wouldn't know if lots of people were getting bad or inadequate treatment, because you're relying upon the self-report of the family."

CONTAINING COSTS: Though hospice observers and caregivers believe that on the whole it provides the terminally ill with a welcome alternative to institutionalized medicine, they agree that managed care and Medicare have altered the movement.

The good news is that more people have access to hospice care. The bad news is that bottom-line-oriented management often minimizes spiritual and other nonmedical aspects of hospice care.

Further, there are signs in Oregon that cost issues may push hospice care toward acceptance of a moral nemesis, physician-assisted suicide.

"I'm happy to say it hasn't happened here," says hospice founder Saunders, who at nearly 80 continues to work full-time as Saint Christopher's chair. "I think the U.S.A. has a lot of restrictions because of your managed care." Great Britain has much greater freedom, Saunders says, because much of the funding is voluntary.

Saint Christopher's origins go to 1958, when Saunders worked at a London home for the dying. Her published research on 200 cancer patients challenged conventional medicine's treatment of the terminally ill. In 1967, Saunders and a group of other London doctors and nurses opened the world's first residential hospice.

COMPETITIVE BUSINESS: For Rita Dailey and her husband, Cliff, the abrupt response to her initial question caused them to seek out an openly Christian alternative. At Southwest Christian Hospice, established in 1983 on the Saint Christopher's model, Dailey's husband died what the Union City, Georgia, hospice workers called a "good death" in August 1995. "I still go out and talk with their counselor when I've got to have somebody to talk to," Dailey says. "They always take time for me."

About 28 percent of hospice programs are independent community-based organizations, according to University of Chicago researcher Nicholas Christakis. Southwest Christian, fully financed by churches and corporate donations, is unusual because it does not charge its patients.

Another 28 percent of hospices are divisions of hospitals, 19 percent are divisions of home health agencies, 6 percent are divisions of hospice corporations, 1 percent are divisions of nursing homes, and 18 percent are "other" or not identified.

"There's more and more competition now in hospice care," says Southwest Christian Hospice director Michael Sorrow. "Once Medicare and Medicaid came out with the benefit, every Tom, Dick, and Harry jumped into the hospice business to make money on it." He believes that some of the newer hospice programs are not as concerned with overall quality.

Jack Gordon, president of the Hospice Foundation of America, says hospice programs are providing good care, but he notes, "The problem with HMOs and insurance companies is that they're very much into a fee-for-service mode, and so they try to buy pieces of hospice care that they think are important. They would limit the nurse visits. They're appalled at the notion of bereavement care—because after the patient's dead, they don't want to have to spend any money."

About 68 percent of hospices are nonprofit, 4 percent are government organizations, 17 percent are for-profit, and 11 percent are "other" or unidentified.

"Hospice has become kind of the medical management of a person's pain and symptoms," says Janice Campbell, hospice community liaison nurse for the Franciscan Health System in Tacoma, a member of Catholic Health Initiatives West. "Hospice programs and doctors and other therapists can easily slip into looking at just the medical aspects of an individual, which aren't all of the aspects by any means."

Researcher Lynn believes that Medicare has played a large part in the hijacking of hospice, though its impact is not completely negative. "It converts hospice to much more of a business," Lynn says. "On the other hand, it made hospice available to a whole lot of people that were never going to get it on a volunteer basis."

The number of Medicare-certified hospices has grown from 31 in 1984, when the benefit began, to 2,154. Eighty percent of hospices are Medicare-certified. In 1997, Medicare paid a per-day rate of $94 for home care and $419 for general inpatient care.

DYING AT HOME: More than 90 percent of hospice care hours are provided in patients' homes.

Helping hands: Unit technician Debbie Hornberger of Evergreen Community Hospice in the Seattle area comforts a patient.

Dana Pias, director of Hospice Managed Care of Shreveport, Louisiana, says that Medicare's flat benefit actually gives her more freedom in her program.

"I don't have to justify every piece of equipment, every piece of medication, every time a nurse goes out," she says.

But Pias and many others in the industry acknowledge that spiritual care often has a lower priority with managed-care organizations and insurance providers.

"They say," Gordon relates, "Well, we don't need the social worker, and the clergy ought to do it for nothing"—whatever they can do to cut down the cost below the Medicare reimbursement rate so they can make [a profit on] the difference."

In 1995, the Offices of the Inspector General and the Health Care Financing Administration issued the findings of Operation Restore Trust, which targeted abuse of the Medicare hospice benefit. It found that the flat daily rate, which is paid irrespective of the amount of services, created an incentive to provide fewer services.

ELEMENTS OF FAITH: For the Daileys, the spiritual dimension was essential to the care of Rita's husband, who she says was not a professing Christian when he entered hospice care. "They offered him life beyond this life," Dailey says. "It was led by God's hand."

During hospice care, Cliff Dailey met a man in his 80s whom he called "Mr. Christian." The elderly believer asked Dailey to pray before his meal. For the first time in half a century, Dailey prayed.

Researcher Christakis estimates that about 5 to 10 percent of hospice patients are cared for by church-run hospices.

Lynn believes that the health-care system should recognize the spiritual significance of the end of life as much as it does life's beginning. "In childbirth, you have to give the family a special room to bond with the infant," Lynn says. "In the same way, we need to learn some kind of language that allows us to make something very special at the end of life."

She says the challenge is striking a balance between professional commitment and moral commitment, and the willingness to serve the sick and financial inducements.

David Schneider, director of membership services for the NHO, says his organization views the spiritual dimension as of equal importance to the physical and psycho-social aspects of hospice care. "But it also is going to vary from patient to patient depending on their own level of spirituality," he says.

Cost restrictions limit the spiritual dimension of care at many hospices, says Pias, who worked for two other programs before coming to Hospice Managed Care of Shreveport, which she notes is a free-standing, for-profit hospice not affiliated with an HMO.

"That's a very strong part of our program," she says, "but most hospices do not employ full-time chaplains. They look at that as an additional service, not a core service."

Camille Dierksen-Gamble, the founder of the Shreveport hospice, started it after her husband died in a hospice that did not include a spiritual dimension.

"The regulations do not say that you have to employ a full-time chaplain," Pias says. "All they say [is that] you have to meet the spiritual needs of the patient. That leaves it open to a huge interpretation."

Many hospice workers across the country agree that spiritual care is lacking, says Fay Davis, director of the hospice program of Tri-Cities Chaplaincy in Kennewick, Washington.

"We have a lot more spiritual emphasis

"Absolutely everyone here is involved in pastoral care," says 15-year hospice worker Jane Quirk, a volunteer at Evergreen Hospice of Kirkland, Washington.

DIFFERENT BELIEF SYSTEMS: Though Southwest Christian may have been founded on the original hospice model, it takes a decidedly more evangelical stance on spiritual care than even Saint Christopher's.

"I have seen how the Judeo-Christian ethic is transferable to other cultures, here than a lot of other hospices have," Davis says. "When I go out to meetings, they're just amazed at the amount of focus we have and what we have available on the spiritual side."

Chaplains are not the only hospice workers who give spiritual care, and some patients find they relate better to nurses, dishwashers, or cooks than to trained clergy.

other religions, and to the agnostic and secular world," Saunders says. "And I think that is right."

Yet, Saunders handles spiritual care the same way many hospice chaplains and workers do in the United States, approaching people from their own religious perspective.

"I wouldn't ever try to proselytize," she says. "We are here not to make people think as we do, but to make them think as deeply as they can in their own way."

However, Sorrow says that Southwest's founders had evangelism in mind from the outset: "They felt that they could not charge the families from that vantage point, because it creates a unique opportunity for our people, our volunteers and our staff, to share the message of Christ—even with people who had never set foot in a church."

Extending quality care: Saunders (left) provided the model for surrounding patients with what is familiar, as does the Connecticut Hospice (below) and what is comfortable, as does the Southwest Christian Hospice (below left).

Sorrow finds New Age thinking commonplace in the hospice movement.

"When they talk about spirituality they talk about it in a totally different light than we would," he says. "They have to rely on a very broad brush to [discuss] the spiritual side."

Many have become Christians through the ministry, Sorrow says. "We don't browbeat people with the Bible when they walk in the door, but our mission statement focuses on the fact that it's the love of Christ that provides the dignity and quality, even up to the end," he says.

ASSISTED DEATH? Though hospice workers almost unanimously express a disdain for physician-assisted suicide, there are already indications that it may become an element of hospice care in Oregon, which in November became the first state to affirm physician-assisted suicide in a voter referendum (CT, Dec. 8, 1997, p. 64). A member of the Health Services Commission of the Oregon Health Plan, Amy Klare, says she expects assisted suicide to be covered by the plan as "comfort care."

"Much to my dismay, I think that we will probably see most hospices allow assisted suicide on their premises," says Gayle Atteberry, director of Oregon Right to Life, which led the opposition to the assisted-suicide measure.

Atteberry says that since the law passed, many hospices that spoke out against assisted suicide are now hesitant to express their position.

"They feel—and I think with a lot of validity—that even if a person thinks, Yes, at some point I might want assisted suicide, once they get into a hospice program they will have their needs met and then they would not want assisted suicide," Atteberry says. "So this puts hospices in a touchy situation."

Rita Marker, director of the Anti-Euthanasia Task Force in Steubenville, Ohio, fears that HMOs and insurance agencies may favor hospices that allow assisted suicide because it is more cost-effective.

"Obviously they're not going to come out and say, 'We have a policy now that we're only going to contract with those agencies that provide assisted suicide, because it's cheaper,'" Marker says. "But we've seen it happening with physicians who have lost what is euphemistically called 'economic credentialing.'" When the patients are doing well, it costs the HMO more than the HMO wants to pay, so they will not contract with that particular physician to provide services any more, she says.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST? Marker points out that many backers of the assisted-suicide measure are associated with HMOs.

"My worry in this country is not the slippery slope of a dictator who would begin to do these things, but the sweet seduction of the marketplace," says Southern Methodist University ethics professor William F. May, author of Testing the Medical Covenant: Active Euthanasia & Health Care Reform (Eerdmans, 1996). "It's cheaper; get 'em out of here. And we spare ourselves expensive care."

George Washington University's Lynn maintains that society must be taught to provide high quality end-of-life care. "Physician-assisted suicide cannot be debated and resolved except in the context of how we will choose to support one another at the end of life," she says.

"After all of this time, [hospice] is not as integrated into the whole scheme of things as it might have been," says Rosemary Johnson Hurzeler, director of the Connecticut Hospice, Inc. More grassroots involvement in hospice care is also a necessary ingredient for better integration with the health-care system.

Last September, Evergreen Hospice, Kirkland, Washington, launched its Faith in Action program to "raise awareness of end-of-life issues and help the faith community enhance their care-giving skills through seminars and presentations at churches.

"First let's take this subject out of the closet, then show people how to do it," says Faith in Action director Karen Modell, who has become known around the community as the "death-friendly one."

Volunteers at Evergreen must pass a rigorous training program. "If it's not the marrow of their soul, they don't stay," says Modell. "This is not easy work. Everyone at every level gets emotionally involved." Integration also requires that Americans change the way they deal with death and dying.

"With the continued expansion of medical care and the ability to keep people alive, with no quality, it's hard for some families to make determination, particularly ones who have no faith," says Fay Davis. "If they are out there with faith, they're going to stay in that medical model to the end."

The irony is that while a minority of the terminally ill die under hospice care, most Americans when surveyed say that they want the kind of care that hospice was originally intended to provide. The Connecticut Hospice, which for seven years owned the word hospice, requires any program that took that name to adhere to its ten principles of hospice care.

Those principles form the basis for a recent initiative of the Connecticut attorney general's office called Physician Assisted Living (PAL)—a counterpoint to assisted suicide that gives patients and health-care providers the opportunity to establish their choice of the hospice option in advance.

"If you have to anticipate death, and you're not ready to do that, then we've lost the opportunity, if you will, to help the people who really need it the most," Hurzeler says.

As one of PAL's originators, she hopes to see the initiative spread across the nation. "The ten principles are part of a whole value system that is couched in the sacredness of life," she says.

THE UNFINISHED

STEPHEN E. SAINT

Forty years ago my father, Nate Saint, and four other young missionaries (Jim Elliot, Pete Fleming, Ed McCulley, and Roger Youderian) were speared to death while trying to reach the "Auca" Indians in the Amazon jungles of South America. Today, I have a home among these people—properly called Huaorani—and some of the very men who speared my father have become substitute grandfathers to my children.

For various reasons, the Huaorani story has become a favorite missionary tale among evangelicals. But there is more to the story than the death of five fine young missionaries and the evangelization of the tribe by the sister of one of the martyrs. While it doesn't lend itself to the happily-ever-after tone that makes the simple version so attractive, it should be told since North American Christians continue to send missionaries into other cultures.

If the primary purpose of missionary effort is to plant indigenous Christian churches, our specific goal as missionaries should be to help these emerging churches become (to use the missiologists' terminology) self-propagating, self-governing, and self-supporting. I would like to examine here to what extent we have helped the Huaorani to achieve these goals after four decades of mission work among them. My hope is that a realistic appraisal of the Huaorani's present spiritual and social condition will serve as a case study from which to evaluate our mission strategies today.

First, let me say that there is unmistakable evidence among certain Huaorani Christians today of a strong desire not only to follow Christ but to share the gospel with others (self-propagation). I remember an encounter I witnessed between some Huaorani Christians and members of a secular North American tour group who were visiting a Huaorani camp.

There were 34 students in this group, all from the University of Washington and Western Washington University. To reach the Huaorani encampment, the students were transported by jungle bus to the end of a graveled path laid down by an oil company. From there, three Huaorani men led them through the eastern flanks of the Andes Mountains in Ecuador and down into the virgin Amazon basin. Their trek included 14 hours by foot on a jungle trail as well as paddling downriver in large dugout canoes to reach the campsite.

As the students unloaded their bags, I could see they had come to truly respect and enjoy their Huaorani guides. So much so, in fact, that as we settled around a campfire that evening, a student asked me where the "savage Huaorani" were that they had read about in preparation for the trip. Sitting on logs under a star-studded sky and with a chorus of jungle insects singing in the background, I explained that the very people they had been traveling, eating, sleeping, and hunting with were, in fact, these "savages."

Seeing the students' looks of disbelief, I suggested they ask some of the Huaorani who were middle-aged or older where their fathers were. One student, taking up the challenge, nodded toward a Huaorani woman. I translated.

"Boto maempo doobae wendapa," she replied—"He is already dead a long time ago. Having been speared, he died." Her tone of voice suggested any other cause would have been unusual.

Four more Huaorani around the circle gave similar answers, graphically showing on their own bodies where each victim had been impaled.

"Ask Ompodae," one student urged another. Several of the young ladies had taken a liking to Ompodae, an unusually warm and affectionate woman who was a wife and a mother of ten.

"My father, too," she said, the pain of the memory showing in her expression. Then, holding out her arm, she pointed at old Dabo, who was listening to our conversation a couple of feet away. "He killed my father and almost all of the rest of my family, too. Living angry, he speared them all."

"My God, I was just sitting next to him," exclaimed one of the young men from the tour group. Another added, "I've heard enough about killing."

But one more Huaorani woman, Dawa, who normally left the conversation to others, spoke up. Pointing to her aging and gentle husband, Kimo, who was sitting by me, she stated, "Hating us, he speared my father, my brothers, and my mother and baby sister whom my mother was nursing in her hammock. He took me and made me his wife."

Our visitors looked genuinely stunned. "How could she live with the man who murdered her family?" one of the young ladies asked. The students began whispering among themselves, and suddenly I pictured the setting from their perspective. They had gotten themselves in a situation where they couldn't travel without a guide. They were utterly dependent for their survival on a group of primitive people that had just admitted to being habitual killers.

It occurred to me that they didn't yet know my relationship to the Huaorani. Dawa had just finished telling how Kimo had killed her family and made her his wife. Now I put my arm around Kimo's shoulders and informed them, "He killed my father, too."

Silence. At last, the question on everyone's mind found a voice: "What changed these people?"

I interpreted the question, and Dawa, Kimo, and other Huaorani began to describe a life where everyone did as they willed. They explained how they threw babies away when they weren't convenient to care for. They talked about how people begged to be buried alive when they knew they were dying so their spirits wouldn't wander without solace when freed from their decomposing and unburied bodies.

One of the Huaorani, a gentle and happy woman, told the group how she had strangled her daughter with her own hands to meet the demands of her speared and dying husband, who wanted his children to be buried with him to keep him company. The one son she had refused to kill was the students' lead guide.

Then they explained to our 34 highly educated young people from the most technologically advanced society in history how they learned from the missionaries that the Man Maker sent his Son to die for people full of hate, fear, and desire for revenge.

"Badly, badly we lived back then," Dawa said. "Now, walking God's trail which he has marked for us on paper [the Bible], we live well. All people still die, but if living you follow God's trail, then dying will lead you to heaven. But only one trail leads there. All other trails lead to where God will never be after death."

Dawa's clear explanation had left her audience spellbound. Now she had a question for her listeners.

"Have you heard me well? Which one of you wants to follow God's trail, living well?"

There was silence again. Then the seed of Dawa's message landed in the fertile soil of at least one heart as a lone hand raised into the night air. Dawa understood the American student's gesture and joyously clapped her hands. "Now I see you well," she said. "Leaving, we will still see each other in God's place some day." Then she looked around at the others. "Dying, I will never see you again if you don't follow God's trail. Think well on what I have spoken, so that dying, we will live happily together in heaven."

As I flew out of the jungle a few days later with the tour leader, I asked him what the students had said they liked best about the tour. "Living with the Huaorani and helping in the tasks of their Stone Age lives," he replied. Then he added: "What made the biggest impression on them, I think, was the realization that Christianity has the ability to change people's lives. I am not a Christian myself, but I would say this was a radical realization for most of these young people. Until this trip, they saw Christianity as just another code of conduct."

Looking back, I see I had been privy to a unique event. I had witnessed the twentieth century coming face to face with the Stone Age—and coming up short. In a fleeting but eternal moment, I had seen God's Great Commission coming full circle. Dawa's Spirit-led witness to the gospel was living proof that my father's blood and Aunt Rachel's lifetime of service had not been given in vain.

Dawa's story rightfully warms the heart. But how many of the Huaorani today are like Dawa? To what extent is the Huaorani church self-propagating? Self-supporting? Self-governing?

In 1995, at the request of the Huaorani, I returned to live with these people of my youth. This followed the burial of my father's sister Rachel, who had lived with them from the first peaceful contact in 1958 until she died of cancer in 1994. The harsh reality I encountered as I returned was that the Huaorani church of the midnineties was less functional than it had been in the early sixties when I lived with Aunt Rachel and the tribe as a young teenager.

The root of the problem, I eventually realized, was that insidious disease that has sucked the life out of many Native American tribes and continues to devastate many ethnic communities within North and South America today—dependency. The Huaorani have become dependent on outsiders—especially North American Christians—for education, for medical and dental services, and for radio communications to relay information between their many villages.

Some of the dependency, of course, had been created by oil companies, government agencies, and other special-interest groups that stand to benefit directly from that dependency—the Huaorani can't very well tell companies to quit exploring for oil while at the same time asking for outboard motors and cash gifts.

Unlike oil companies, however, the church has a great deal to lose from creating dependency. While most missionaries would not consciously foster dependency, I believe the Devil deceives us into creating this state by prompting us to mix into our legitimate desire to help others a small measure of pride and a dose of cultural arrogance.

It happens almost undiscernibly. Those who have worked with the Huaorani know how very difficult it is for sophisticated, hi-tech North Americans to believe that "primitive" people can take over where we leave off in the process of establishing their church. Take medicine, for example. Health care is one of the most effective means of creating credibility and gaining acceptance in frontier areas. Medical work requires communication links between outposts and a clinic site. Patients must be transported to the clinic by airplane in many remote areas. Electrical power must be generated, clean efficient buildings must be built, and the list goes on and on.

Educated and sophisticated outsiders like ourselves find it hard to imagine—much less trust—people like the Huaorani with building clinics, doing dental work, and flying airplanes. Historically, the Huaorani have been hunter-gatherers who lived demonstrated a kind of leadership that was both culturally and spiritually fitting for the Huaorani church.

One of the specific mistakes that we have made, I believe, has been to allow believers from the outside, who have never lived with the Huaorani and who don't understand their culture, to exert a great deal of influence over the Huaorani church. As innocuous as special Bible conferences and classes may sound, the presence of the outside leaders and teachers who conducted these conferences over the years (and still do) served to undermine the fragile belief among the Huaorani believers that they could govern their own church and teach their own people. (I've seen even the smallest gestures of kindness undermine responsible leadership. A Huaorani father and lifelong friend of mine asked me why outsiders give his kids sweets at the school. "Now my children won't drink their banana drink at home. Scolding their mother they just say, we want cookies like they give us at school.")

Lacking self-leadership and facing the loss of their old way of life, the Huaorani have been left poor both materially and spiritually. And sadly, virtually no effort was made by the missionaries in thatched-roof houses with dirt floors, hunting wild pigs, turkeys, tapirs, and deer with spears or nine-foot-long blowguns. Most Huaorani maintained houses and gardens in three or more locations, moving among them as dictated by game depletion or the threat of attack from enemies. They had no chiefs, council, or other means of organizing defense of their territory against outsiders or negotiating peace with each other. In fact, outsiders were not their greatest concern; killing within the tribe was so rampant that they were on the verge of annihilating themselves.

The gospel and the people who brought it gave the Huaorani reason to quit killing outsiders and each other, and in 40 years the tribe has nearly tripled in size (today there are around 1,500). From the beginning, there were signs the Huaorani had accepted for themselves the task of evangelism, and many from the older generation were converted by the witness of their peers. But the younger generation has not understood the perpetual fear and hate that dominated their parents' and grandparents' lives. Today only a handful of the younger generation demonstrates an abiding faith in the God and message of peace that so radically changed their parents' lives.

What has blunted this initial Huaorani desire for winning and discipling their own? I believe it was a failure as missionaries to help the Huaorani church become self-governing. Here, too, the Huaorani had demonstrated early signs of leadership, in spite of the fact that "organizing" and "governing" are totally new concepts to their culture. When I was a teenager, one of the Huaorani friends that I was baptized with led some other young boys in killing a witch doctor's son. The believers knew that this was wrong and that Inihua needed to be punished. One of the older believers and the father of one of Inihua's accomplices suggested that the guilty ones should be killed. Others said that, as Christians, they shouldn't kill anymore, even for punishment.

At last they decided they would pray and ask God himself to punish Inihua. Within days, Inihua, a healthy young man, fell on the ground in front of witnesses, convulsed, and died. While not a typical North American leadership approach (or result), it over the last four decades to help the Huaorani establish a viable economy from which they could financially support their church, their families, or God's commission to reach their own people.

The Huaorani believers are now in the midst of an experiment at becoming self-supporting. In just two-and-a-half years they have built and are running their own dental clinic, pharmacy, trading post, and school. As they drill and fill their own people's teeth, they share God's message with them. They are hosting tours of outsiders (hence, the college students from Washington), who pay to visit these "Stone Age" people. Recently, the Huaorani have asked me to help them build and learn to operate their own aircraft, which they see as critical to their long-term independence as a church and as a people.

My contribution has been to cheer them on and to convince them from the Bible that this is God's will. I have also played the thankless task of challenging foreigners who seem bent on perpetuating "missions" here.

Will it work in the long run? I am convinced it can. So are the Huaorani. I believe that this is the tribe's only spiritual and economic hope. Outsiders will never get the job done. Neither should they, for we have no business doing what the Huaorani are capable of doing themselves. We must limit our involvement to helping them in the areas they are not yet able to overcome, making every effort to help them become self-sufficient in those areas as quickly as possible.

Christ said that we should "make disciples of all men, teaching them to observe all" that he had commanded us to observe. Faithful missionaries such as Cathy Peek, Rosie Jung, Pat Kell, and Aunt Rachel gave the Huaorani the New Testament in their own language. This is a fundamental building block for establishing any church. I am excited that the Huaorani have begun to see themselves as true participants in this Great Commission. I pray that we North American Christians, too, will learn to view them—and the others we are reaching out to—in the same way. It is, after all, the gospel way.

Jimmy Carter's Lesson Plan

Former President Jimmy Carter is the most famous Sunday-school teacher in America—a task he's been at since age 18. Even during his tenure as President, he taught Sunday school occasionally at the First Baptist Church of Washington. Today he continues teaching at Maranatha Baptist Church in Plains, Georgia. After the surprising success of his religious autobiography, Living Faith (Times Books, 1996), Carter worked on a sequel: Sources of Strength: Meditations on Scripture for a Living Faith, a selection of 52 out of the 1,600 Sunday-school lessons he has taught over the years. In a telephone interview with CHRISTIANITY TODAY, associate editor Richard A. Kauffman talked to Carter about everything from Sunday school and personal faith to the Southern Baptist Convention and world politics.

In 1957 Life magazine said that Sunday school was the most wasted hour of the week. You must disagree.

We have hundreds of people who come to Maranatha Baptist for the Sunday-school experience. One Sunday we had folks from 28 different nations. I realize that a lot of them come just to meet a former President. But a lot tell me afterwards, "This is the first time I've ever been in a church." Some say they would like to pursue religion more. So this book, I hope, will reach out to these people.

The former President reflects on pursuing peace in the world and among Southern Baptists.

In Living Faith, you write that as a young person you had doubts about your faith. How do you deal with doubts now?

One of the facets of a sound Christian faith is to level with God about your doubts or disbelief, your lack of wisdom or strength. God can withstand tough, honest prayers. I try to face my doubts and fears forcefully with confidence that God will forgive me.

When Paul was asked what are the things that never change and are important, he replied: the things you cannot see. These things that you cannot see epitomize the life of Christ—justice, truth, peace, forgiveness, compassion, love, humility, service. These are the focus of the Christian faith.

How do you view the division between moderates and conservatives within your own denomination, the Southern Baptist Convention?

I would like very much to see this rift healed. This past week we had twenty-some leading conservative and moderate Baptists come to the Carter Center in Atlanta for a private session just to talk about where we can go from here, how we can heal the wounds that exist. I presided over the group. I asked everyone present not to make a single negative comment about any other Baptists, and we didn't. We just explored future directions in a positive fashion. We're going to follow up with some other private meetings, just exploring possible things on which we all can agree.

A lot of Christians, not just Baptists, have been alienated from active participation in the church—including some of my children—by the highly publicized disharmony that exists among Christians.

In Sources of Strength you mention your daughter Amy's reaction in particular.

Her participation in the church has been adversely affected by the Southern Baptist Convention's stance against the equal role of women in the church. Within our seminaries, a professor who espouses equality of women in the church is denied the right to teach. We have about 3,500 Baptist churches in Georgia; only one has a woman pastor. I believe that women should be treated equally with men in affairs of the church.

If you were invited to speak to a national gathering of the Christian Coalition, what would you say to them?

Last year I was on Pat Robertson's show, and we discussed our basic Christian faith. I disagree pretty strongly on some facets of their faith. For instance, separation of church and state. It's contrary to my beliefs to try to exalt Christianity as having some sort of preferential status in the United States. That violates the Constitution. I'm not in favor of mandatory prayer in school or of using public funds to finance religious education.

I don't, however, see anything wrong with Christians, Muslims, and Jews exhibiting their own faith in the political arena. Christ tried to change the society within which he lived. He didn't hold public office and wouldn't have. But you don't have to hold public office to try to change the basic policies of a country.

How can Christians help bring about what you call "a social reformation" in our country?

The obvious answer is to follow the standards and the priorities that were established so clearly by the words and actions of Jesus Christ, who was dedicated to justice, peace, humility, service, compassion, and love. I would put an emphasis at this moment among Christians on forgiveness and accommodation.

We have a very harsh society now. It's almost totally devoted to punishment. In Living Faith I pointed out the dramatic difference in attitudes now toward criminals from what it was when I was governor of Georgia over 20 years ago. We governors then were competing with each other over who could have the fewest people in prison and the most aggressive program rehabilitating the lives of inmates. Now the governors brag about how many new prison cells they're building.

What do you think the United States ought to be doing about persecution of Christians in places like China?

When I normalized relations with China in 1979, China did not permit any religious worship or distribution of Bibles. Deng Xiaoping promised me he would change the constitution of China to guarantee freedom of religion, which he did in 1982. And he also promised to permit the free distribution of Bibles, which they have done and still are doing. China has made a great deal of progress but still has a long way to go. There are still restraints on worship in China. Each congregation has to register with the government, and a lot of people disagree with that.

Our government ought to publicize abuses, although I'm not sure that our government should single out Christians. I imposed human-rights standards for all people, not just for one faith.

Should Most Favored Nation status be used as a carrot or a stick?

We shouldn't link Most Favored Nation status with China's attitude toward religious freedom. The best way to keep China increasingly open to worship—and trade, commerce, and political change—is by them being in relationship with the outside world. The same with Cuba: we shouldn't isolate Cuba but allow free trade, commerce, and visitation back and forth. That's the best way to break down totalitarianism.

What are your thoughts on U.S. policy toward the Middle East peace process and Iraq?

Concerning the Middle East, the U.S. has changed its policies dramatically. I and all my predecessors in the White House since 1948 characterized Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza as both illegal and an obstacle to peace. Nowadays, U.S. policy is that the Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza are neither illegal nor an obstacle to peace if they're somewhat restrained. The United States government has got to play a much more forceful role in putting forward acceptable solutions and not just stand back and listen to the complaints from the Palestinians and the Israelis.

On Iraq, I was one of the few people who did not think the Gulf War was necessary. The Iraqis were attempting, through the Saudi Arabians, to negotiate their problems peacefully with Kuwait, but by then the United States had already decided to go to war. The massive bombing of Iraq by the U.S. will not be supported by other nations and will result in the deaths of many innocent civilians.

I'm not a pacifist, but I think many wars can be prevented if we as a nation commit ourselves to the enhancement of peace. Possibly two wars were prevented in 1994 as a result of work by the Carter Center: North Korea, as Kim Il Sung was apparently evolving a nuclear capability; and Haiti, when 30,000 American troops were poised to invade the country until we worked out a peace agreement. There are times when our country needs to defend freedom and liberty for ourselves and others, the most brutal case being against Hitler. There are other times when we might avoid a war by more careful diplomacy.

Women of the Harvest

With women representing over half of the missionary force serving overseas, the need is to connect these women to each other. Welcome Women of the Harvest!

"I don't generally subscribe to magazines, so when I received your premiere issue, I was not at all interested until I opened it and started to read. Instead of dry 'how to's,' I was reading feelings from the hearts of other women who desperately want to serve God, who also struggle in the process. I immediately felt a bond with these women and the encouragement that I am not alone."

— C. Hunter, Slov

"Until now, there have been limited resources available to women serving foreign missions. Women of the Harvest is designed for women serving cross-culturally — a connection to each other with shared experiences and struggles. Women of the Harvest offers hope, encouragement and support to women around the world. I highly recommend Women of the Harvest as an excellent resource for caring for the women in your missionary family."

Adventures in Fasting

What happens when you put a spiritual leader on a long, restricted diet? First you get a few complaints, and then this insightful essay, reprinted from CHRISTIANITY TODAY's sister publication LEADERSHIP: A Practical Journal for Church Leaders. The author is Ben Patterson, dean of the chapel at Hope College in Holland, Michigan.

Someone said the prospect of standing before a firing squad marvelously focuses one's mind. Other things can have the same effect—like the telephone call from a friend last March in which he told me, “Perhaps the Lord is leading us to fast for 40 days.”

Us? I hate to fast. I'd tried fasting, and instead of insights I got irritable.

When Bill Bright reported on his 40-day fast, I held him in awe—the same detached awe I have for someone who can run a mile in under four minutes. It's amazing he can do it, but it would be futile for me even to try.

My friend's call got my attention. As I prayed, the unwelcome conviction grew that a 40-day fast was precisely what God was asking of us. So we covenanted with 30 or 40 people to fast for the 40 days leading up to Pentecost.

The purpose would be to fast and pray for the two things Jonathan Edwards urged the churches of eighteenth-century New England to pray for: the spiritual awakening of the church in our town and beyond, and the spread of the kingdom of God worldwide. The mode of the fast would vary from person to person. Some would take only juices. My wife and I would do a “Daniel” fast and eat only fruits, vegetables, and grains—no meats, fats, or sugar. From time to time during the fast, as the Lord led, we too would have a day of juice only. Whenever possible, we who had covenanted to fast would meet for an hour of prayer on Friday mornings.

The fast is now over. What our prayer and fasting meant for the kingdom of God remains to be seen, but my mind has been marvelously focused.

The first focus is on what a slave I can be to food. Am I sad? I eat. Am I happy? Eat. Tired? Eat.

Angry, depressed, bored? Eat, eat, eat. Do we have a social occasion? We must eat. My life can parody 1 Thessalonians 5:16-18: "Be eating always, eat continually, and eat in all circumstances."

I was surprised, then exhilarated at how free I was during the fast. What began as a command quickly became a permission. The permission? Not to have to live on the level of my appetites. “Do not work for food that spoils,” said Jesus, “but for food that endures to eternal life, which the Son of Man will give you” (John 6:27, NIV). As the fast came to an end, I actually became a little afraid to go back to eating normally, fearful I might lose the freedom I had gained. (So far, so good.)

Second, my mind was marvelously focused on the fact that gluttony is about more than mere volume of food. It can express itself also as an inordinate interest in the experience of food, making taste buds promiscuous and stomachs ravenous for novelty and variety. I eat out often, and some menus describe the exotic, even spiritual experiences I will have if I order this item or that. I've seen chocolate desserts described as "Pure Sin."

The fast focused my mind on the simple goodness of God's creation. At first the foods I restricted myself to made the prospect of a meal boring. Beans again? Another salad? Not carrots! But I rediscovered how good a mere carrot can be. Or a bare slice of bread, or a crisp apple. With simplicity comes gratitude and joy.

Which leads to the third and most marvelous focus the fast brought to my mind: that food is ultimately not about food, but about God. The meaning of hunger—indeed, of all desire—is to point us to God, our only true Provider. We shouldn't be too quick to make hunger go away, for it can teach us much about our frailty, need, and emptiness apart from God.

A full stomach can be cause for deep gratitude, or as it has so often been for me, cause for spiritual dullness and torpor. A little hunger never hurt anyone, but its absence will.

Shouldn't your church include indigenous mission in its annual missions budget?

Some 6000 indigenous ministries have more than 200,000 missionaries in the field

In most "mission field" countries, they carry out 90% of all pioneer evangelistic work among unreached people groups, even though they have only 10% of the financial support which American missions have. In closed lands such as India, Myanmar (Burma), Vietnam, Iraq, Iran, Communist China, and Cuba they do 100% of the work.

Shouldn't your church have a share in their ministry?

$50 monthly supports a missionary

God has raised up about 6000 indigenous missions worldwide. Half are in countries that are closed to missionaries from the USA. Altogether they have over 200,000 missionaries on the field, most of whom live on $50 per month, or less. Thousands have no support at all. Christian Aid has their names and photographs, and will send one to each sponsor who gives $50 monthly to support a missionary. Many churches support over 100 such missionaries.

Shouldn't your church be supporting some of these missionaries?

Over 500 Bible Institutes

Indigenous missions operate over 500 Bible institutes and missionary training centers. Often their students must go without food, or if they do eat it may be only rice or beans for days at a time. Many Bible institute teachers must work at full time jobs to support themselves and their families, and still teach 30 or 40 hours a week.

Shouldn't your church be helping to provide financial support for indigenous Bible schools?

Transportation needs

Thousands of native missionaries must walk 30 miles a day because they don't have money to buy a bicycle. Hundreds of mission boards with 100 or more missionaries on the field can't get their workers together for conferences, or send leaders to visit them on the field, because they don't have a motor vehicle.

Shouldn't your church be helping to provide bicycles, jeeps and vans for indigenous mission boards and traveling evangelistic teams?

Many needs to meet

Indigenous missions need financial assistance for printing Bibles and literature, Scripture translation, radio and broadcasting, care for homeless children, medical clinics, and to provide emergency food and shelter for victims of persecution, typhoons, floods, fires, earthquakes, epidemics, wars and famines caused by drought.

Shouldn't your church be meeting some of these needs among the poorest people on earth?

Christian Aid links U.S. churches with indigenous missionary ministries both in closed countries, and lands of poverty where Christians lack resources. To learn how you can help contact:

Chocolate Theology

David Augsburg

The mysterious and mystical theobromine (literally, "the food of the gods"), which is commonly called chocolate, is a substance deserving of thoughtful and tasteful theological analysis. As one of the primary motivators of human behavior (hunger, thirst, pain, pleasure, self-esteem, sexual desire, and chocolate), it is a force deserving ontological, theological, historical, ethical, and relational reflection.

Ontologically, chocolate raises profoundly disturbing questions: Does not chocolate offer natural revelation of the goodness of the Creator just as chilies disclose a divine sense of humor? Is the human born with an innate longing for chocolate? Does the notion of chocolate preclude the concept of free will? If chocolate is a foretaste of heaven, what does it mean that chocolate is freely available to all?

Theologically, the creation of chocolate demonstrates both the unity and the diversity of humanity. Wherever you taste it, in every country of the world, it is immediately recognizable. Other things, in every cuisine, are just food, but chocolate is chocolate. At the same that contains the letter a, e, i, o, or u is the proper time to share it with others.

Historically, the discovery of chocolate by the Mayans and Aztecs dates to the dawn of time. The drink they made from the beans of the cacao tree, called xocoatl, was the queen of nutrients, medications, aphrodisiacs, and social lubricants. Hernán Cortés, the sixteenth-century Spaniard, wrote, "One cup of this precious drink permits one to walk a whole day without taking nourishment." Its introduction to Europe by the Spanish invaders in 1528 began the worldwide spread of cho-co-LAH-tay. By 1615 it was served at a royal wedding in France. By 1662 it was reported in England as chocolata (Stubbs), and in 1669 as jocolatte (Pepys). By 1700 it had become an almost universal common denominator.

Ethically, chocolate is meant to be shared. Its essential purpose is the creation of community, of joint experiences of joy, of celebrating the goodness of creation. Chocolate is a primary means of strengthening the human will. Willpower is the ability to break a piece of chocolate into four pieces with your bare hands and then eat only one of them.

Relationally, chocolate has been widely touted as a substitute for love. Phenylethylamine is identical to the substance manufactured in the brain during infatuation, so the sweet stuff is nothing more than a counterfeit affection. Is chocolate only a self-medication for loneliness, or does the true chocolate lover sometimes substitute love and affection for the real joy of chocolate?

The central issues we face in confronting this essential substance of the life force, this elixir of existence, are: How shall we maintain the courage of our confections? How shall we live a life worthy of the glory of this good gift of God? and, How shall we confront those who see chocolate as a symbol of wickedness and guilt? (I refer to all those desserts named "Chocolate Decadence" and "Chocolate Sin" and to those references to the "devil's food" that defame this means of healthful living, this virtuous vital force that can carry us through the light and dark, the bitter and the sweet of life.)

THE CONTEMPORARY PARALLEL NEW TESTAMENT

Featuring: King James Version • New American Standard Bible Updated Edition • New Century Version • Contemporary English Version • New International Version • New Living Translation
New King James Version • The Message

EDITED BY JOHN R. KOHLENBERGER, III

With so many Bibles available today, comparing how different versions interpret key terms and phrases can be quite a chore! Now there's a solution to this dilemma: The Contemporary Parallel New Testament. This exciting new parallel text volume features the eight most popular translations of the New Testament today. With the exception of the classic King James Version, all of them have been published in recent years. This is the first parallel text resource to include the popular New International Version and New King James Version. So, when your Bible study calls for comparing translations, rely on The Contemporary Parallel New Testament.

ISBN: 0-19-528136-5 Hardcover, 1,824 pages $39.99

Every purchaser of The Contemporary Parallel New Testament can designate one of the following Christian charities to receive a fifty-cent donation from Oxford University Press!

Should We Give Up on Government?

Christians are flirting with libertarianism, but it is not a biblical option.

Ronald J. Sider & Fred Clark

Like many Americans these days, John Stagliano loves his country but hates his government. The entrepreneur and self-made millionaire views government as a necessary evil at best and, at worst, a restrictive and regulatory nightmare intent on usurping his personal and economic liberties.

Stagliano's antipathy is directed not only at the current Congress or administration, but at government itself. He is a major, outspoken contributor to the Cato Institute, an influential libertarian think tank. Groups like Cato have moved political debate away from discussions of good government versus bad government. Their presumption is that government, by definition, is bad. So the debate becomes big government versus small government.

G. K. Chesterton said, "The poor object to being governed badly, while the rich object to being governed at all." This is especially true of rich people like Stagliano, who makes his fortune in an industry that is particularly prone to government "interference": pornography. Stagliano produces and directs hard-core sex videos. His company, Evil Angel Video, is one of the leading players in America's $8-billion-a-year trade in sexually explicit material.

Fatal attraction

Perhaps it is not surprising that libertarianism is an attractive philosophy for a millionaire pornographer. What is surprising is the extent to which libertarian ideas have begun to influence politically active Christians, especially evangelicals.

We evangelicals are experiencing an adolescent growth spurt in our political engagement and thinking. Still heady with the zeal of newfound political activism, we haven't yet demonstrated the patience or discipline for sustained political reflection, for engaging the centuries-long conversation on Christianity and politics, on statecraft, and on the proper role and responsibilities of the civil authorities instituted by God.

Nature abhors a vacuum. To the extent that we have failed to adopt a biblical, Christian understanding, we have instead adapted to the prevailing ideologies of our secular culture. This ideological vacuum has left evangelicals particularly susceptible to ideologies shaped by our individualist, modern culture and the logical conclusion of individualistic liberalism: libertarianism.

Libertarianism permits only an extremely limited role for government in maintaining civic order and providing national defense. It is attractive for its simplicity and its "one-size-fits-all" principle of individual liberty. This pro-choice-on-everything framework clashes with the Christian insistence that what one chooses also matters, and that some choices must be limited or prohibited for the common good. The trump card of unlimited individual liberty leads libertarians to many conclusions traditionally opposed by Christians and social conservatives, including support for abortion on demand, same-sex marriage, and unregulated markets in pornography.

and narcotics (hence its attraction for John Stagliano).

Can libertarianism be reconciled with the Christian understanding that government is "instituted by God" as "God's servant for your good" (Rom. 13:1, 4)? To their credit, some Christian libertarians take great pains to distinguish their views from those of secular libertarian thinkers. The problem, of course, is that it is difficult to do so. Evangelical Doug Bandow of the Cato Institute asserts, "Libertarianism is not synonymous with libertinism," but he has a hard time explaining why. His libertarian colleagues David Boaz and Charles Murray, or Massachusetts governor William Weld, still seem unconvinced. Michael Uhlmann, a Catholic fellow at the conservative Ethics and Public Policy Center, finds the very idea of Christian libertarianism puzzling, owing "more to John Stuart Mill than to anything distinctly Christian."

The influence of libertarianism has led many evangelicals to adopt a starkly antagonistic view of the responsibilities of government and the church, the public and the private sectors. Operating from this either/or perspective, some argue that since individual Christians are commanded to care for the poor, it must not be any of the government's business. But such a conclusion requires that we dismiss the large body of biblical teaching that says the government has a responsibility to care for the poor. It also ignores centuries of biblically based Christian thought and teaching on the distinct but complementary roles of state, family, and church (exemplified in the Catholic idea of "subsidiarity" and the Reformed concept of "sphere sovereignty").

Critics of government programs, such as Marvin Olasky, are right to point out the ways in which government has sometimes failed miserably to meet its responsibilities, but it does not follow that the state therefore does not have any such responsibilities. It is also true that some of the best work empowering the poor is being done by faith-based nonprofit agencies, but that does not absolve other actors—governments, neighbors, relatives—from fulfilling their respective, God-given responsibilities as well.

What's a king to do?

We should be extremely cautious in giving up on government. Before we do so we ought to examine the long history of Christian political thinking that we would be rejecting. It should give us pause that Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, Luther, Calvin, and Wesley all taught that the emperor, king, prince, civil magistrate, or elected officials were the servants of God, ordained for the common good.

The past century of Catholic social teaching and the Reformed tradition of Abraham Kuyper offer rich, instructive perspectives. These Christian movements were both unflinching in their opposition to state socialism and deeply suspicious of state intrusion into other areas of civil society. Yet they were equally adamant that government, under God, has a legitimate and necessary role to play, including doing justice for the poor and the disadvantaged. Kuyper, a theologian and a politician who was elected prime minister of the Netherlands, said in a speech, "God the Lord unmistakably ple of using government power to correct economic injustice. The nobles were taking the lands of the poor and selling their children into slavery. Nehemiah, the top government official, denounces this abuse and compels the rich to return everything: "Restore them, this very day, their fields, their vineyards, their olive orchards, and their houses and the interest on money, grain, wine, and oil that you have been exacting from them" (v. 11).

The king's responsibility for justice means more than merely maintaining unbiased courts; the just king also strengthens the weak, heals the sick, and binds up the crippled (Ezek. 34:4, 16, 23). The king must seek justice as God does (Ps. 72:4)—and remember, it is the Lord "who executes justice for the orphan and the widow, and who loves

"The poor object to being governed badly, while the rich object to being governed at all."

—G. K. Chesterton instituted the basic rule for the duty of government. Government exists to administer his justice on earth, and to uphold that justice."

Our task as evangelicals—because we are evangelicals—is to study this rich Christian tradition in the light of biblical revelation. Scripture is our bottom line, and our understandings of the role of state (as well as church, commerce, families, and individuals) must be shaped by biblical principles.

Throughout the Bible, God held leaders responsible to actively seek justice for the poor. Psalm 72 is a prayer for the king: "Give the king your justice, O God, and your righteousness to a king's son. May he judge your people with righteousness, and your poor with justice" (vv. 1–2, NRSV). The two key words here, justice and righteousness, pertain both to the legal system and to the economic order. The prophets condemn those who deprive people of the land that would enable them to earn their own way (see Isa. 5:8–9) and call on the king to correct such injustice. "May [the king] defend the cause of the poor of the people . . . and crush the oppressor" (Ps. 72:4).

Nehemiah 5 offers a fascinating example of using government power to correct economic injustice. The nobles were taking the lands of the poor and selling their children into slavery. Nehemiah, the top government official, denounces this abuse and compels the rich to return everything: "Restore them, this very day, their fields, their vineyards, their olive orchards, and their houses and the interest on money, grain, wine, and oil that you have been exacting from them" (v. 11).

Interestingly, these norms apply not just to Israel's rulers, but to rulers everywhere. Daniel 4:27 calls Nebuchadnezzar to bring justice and mercy to the oppressed. Proverbs 31 directs King Lemuel (probably a northern Arabian monarch) to "defend the rights of the poor and needy."

None of this means that the government is the only institution or agency responsible to empower the poor. Individuals and congregations are commanded to share sacrificially with the poor. We also need a vast array of nongovernmental institutions in society that lift up the needy. Often, in fact, these intermediate institutions will do the job better than governmental agencies.

But it is simply unbiblical to claim that government has no responsibility to seek justice for the poor. Government is God's servant for good. Part of its God-given task is to make sure that the poorest have the resources to earn their own living.

How Apin Akot Redeemed His Daughter

It was February 1995 when the dawn raiders attacked the Sudanese village of Sokobat in northern Bahr-El-Ghazal. Apin Akot was already out tending his cattle with his two-year-old son when his wife and two daughters, ages five and nine, were rounded up by fundamentalist Islamic militia. They had been armed and encouraged by the government of Sudan to carry out a jihad (holy war) against the Africans—mostly Christians—of the south. The government, the National Islamic Front become a concubine and much more “valuable.”

Apin Akot did not have enough money for her and had to return with his wife and little daughter, leaving his eldest daughter to her fate. As he left, she said, “The worst thing for me would be to die. As long as I stay alive, I know you will come for me.”

Our group met Apin Akot soon after his return and felt his family’s grief. His wife told us, “The Arabs came at dawn and captured us; on the way they did what they wanted with us. They tied babies onto horses, and our daughter has a paralyzed leg as a result. We walked on foot for two days. We were taken north to a camp where they built a fence around us. We were beaten every day. They took girls to work. Sometimes we had to work as domestic slaves or as water carriers. For food we were given only unground sorghum—no milk, no oil, nothing else.”

We were able to provide the necessary funds for Apin Akot to redeem his elder daughter. Risking his life again, he returned north and negotiated her freedom—just in time. This year, she would have been subjected to a barbaric clitorrectomy (“female circumcision”). His daughter, Akec Apin, told us her story: “When I was captured, my hands were tied with strong rope. All the bad jobs were given to me—grinding dura and carrying water from the well at night. If I was slow fetching the water, my master beat me with a big stick. All the family beat me.”

She was told by her owner that this year she would be married to his son. She would be forced to join in Muslim prayers and wear Muslim women’s headress. She said that when her father came the first time, she could not believe her eyes; she looked again and again and thought it was a dream. When she had to say good-bye on that first occasion it was “a bad time,” and she could not eat anything for days.

Now she is happy, and Apin Akot is overjoyed, saying, “When I got my daughter back, I felt as if I had been born again—like God giving me new life.”

Despite their suffering, they still smile with the famous Sudanese smile. I wish you could see the joy on their faces when they worship in what they call their “cathedrals” under the beautiful tamarind trees. CL (NIF), is a totalitarian military regime, which seized power in 1989. The government cannot pay salaries, but the militias can keep the bounty of war as their reward—including human bounty. On that fateful February morning, when his wife and daughters were taken, his five-year-old could not keep up with the raiders as they drove their captives northwards. So they tied her onto a horse, damaging a nerve and paralyzing her left leg.

Apin Akot is a loving husband and father; he is also a brave man. He sold all his cattle, took his money, and, risking capture, torture, and death, walked north for many days to find his enslaved family. Paying an Arab to help him find them, he confronted their owner and tried to purchase their freedom. He negotiated the release of his wife and five-year-old daughter, but the master would not relinquish the nine-year-old: she was nearly old enough to

The Moral Minority

What would Jesus do to influence culture?

Sinners in the Hands of an Angry Church: Finding a Better Way to Influence Our Culture, by Dean Merrill (Zondervan, 183 pp.; $12.99, paper).
Reviewed by John Wilson.

If there is one thing that American Christians at the end of the twentieth century have in common, it is a strenuous wrestling with what it means to be the church. Sometimes, though not as often as we might hope, this questioning is pursued with full consciousness of the issues at stake; undergirded by sustained theological reflection, and always tested against Scripture; more often, questions like What is the church, really? and How do we know what it should look like? are taken up in a pragmatic, hit-and-miss fashion. But whatever form it takes, this questioning cuts across all the usual dividing lines of race and denomination and worship style. The members of the Willow Creek Association are rethinking church from the ground up—not least in dispensing with the name “church”! And so also, when Francis George, the new archbishop of Chicago and soon-to-be cardinal, makes evangelization the keynote of his program, he is asking American Catholics to rethink the meaning of church.

With Sinners in the Hands of an Angry Church: Finding a Better Way to Influence Our Culture, Dean Merrill has made a valuable contribution to this ongoing reexamination. Merrill, a former vice president at Focus on the Family and currently vice president and publisher of the International Bible Society, does what a long line of Christian provocateurs have done, going all the way back to the apostle Paul. The trick is simple. You merely ask Christians, Suppose what you say you believe is really true—how should you then live?

That question is too staggering in its implications to be treated fully in any one book (or any ten books), and the provocateur typically homes in on certain teachings that play against the complacencies of this or that segment of Christendom, as Dorothy Day did with the Catholic Workers, or as John Perkins has done in a series of challenging books calling for racial reconciliation, or Philip Yancey in What's So Amazing About Grace?

So too Merrill has a target audience in mind (though he wouldn't object, I'm sure, if other Christians listened in). He's primarily addressing evangelical Christians, especially but not exclusively those who share at least some of the concerns of the Religious Right.

Merrill's method is to take some notion that is axiomatic among the readers whose minds he hopes to change—and then turn that assumption upside-down or inside-out. Is America a Christian nation? Well of course it is! the unwary reader responds. Just look at the Founding Fathers. Yes, says Merrill, let's do that—and he proceeds to deconstruct that beguiling illusion. (See especially the wonderfully titled chapter, “Will We See Thomas Jefferson in Heaven?”) Is America sledding toward Gomorrah? Absolutely! Why, just look at today's newspaper. Not so fast, counters Merrill. A close-to-the-bone slice of his own family history, from “the Indiana heartland” in the year 1915, suggests that maybe the good old days weren't as radically different from our troubled times as we're encouraged to believe.

And so it goes. But Merrill is not simply taking these assumptions piecemeal; he has a broad strategy in mind. We Christians—or Christ-followers, as he prefers to say—constitute a minority, even in “Christian” America. Sounding a little like Stanley Hauerwas, he calls for a fundamental change in the way Christians seek to influence the larger culture.

Of course we live in a fallen world, Merrill says; what did we expect? But have we forgotten that God is still in charge? We are impatient; we want God “to hurry up, to cure all ills, to settle all scores. When he does not, we often conclude that he doesn't really care, and so we'll have to take up the job he is neglecting." What hubris! "Whether fast or slow, dramatic or subtle," Merrill reminds us, "God's action in this messy world should never be undersold. He is still the supreme authority, and while his timing may mystify us, his power is not to be doubted."

So how should the Christian minority seek to influence our culture? Instead of fighting fire with fire, we can be salt and light:

What would it take for non-Christians to begin saying about us, "You know, I don't understand everything about those people, and I don't agree with them on some issues. But they're certainly good to have around. They're a valuable asset to society. I'd hate to see this town, this country, this nation have to get along without them."

This passage hints at the limitations of Merrill's book as well as its winsomeness. Unlike Hauerwas, Merrill doesn't take our fallenness quite seriously enough. What would non-Christians do if Christians were consistently following in Christ's steps? That would be interesting to see. Crucify us, maybe?

There's a lack of tough-mindedness at other points as well, most egregiously in the sappy "Short 'To Do' List for Christ-Followers" that concludes the book. This includes a number of bulleted items, the first six of which are as follows:

- Pray regularly for the president to hear God's voice.
- Pray regularly for the vice president to hear God's voice.
- Pray the same for your U.S. representative.
- Pray the same for your two U.S. senators.
- Stop telling politician jokes.

- Stop laughing at other people's politician jokes.

And so on. It's the sort of list that makes you run screaming to your files for an antidote—a good dose of P. J. O'Rourke, say. Merrill should visit the American history section of his local superstore to take a look at the recently published and extremely revealing volumes of tape-recorded history from the Kennedy, Johnson, and Nixon administrations (And then there's the fellow currently in office.) No politician jokes? Does the man want to rob us of our only consolation?

But whatever bones you have to pick with Merrill—and every reader will have some—his book will repay your full attention. Pack it in the carryon bag on your next trip—you could read it in one long flight—or read it in your small group or Sunday-school class. But feel free to go ahead and enjoy a good politician joke now and then. C

Sproul on the Will

This influential Calvinist's account of the free-will problem would have profited from a stronger reading of Calvin.

Willing to Believe: The Controversy

Over Free Will, by R. C. Sproul (Baker Books, 224 pp.; $15.99, hardcover).

Reviewed by Allen C. Guelzo, Grace F. Kea Professor of American History and chair of the Department of History and Political Science at Eastern College, Saint Davids, Pennsylvania.

Free will is one of those perennial tough-nut problems, like consciousness and expressway traffic, whose solution seems perfectly obvious until we start thinking about it. It usually appears, from our internal sensation of being able to choose (or to move or to pause over possible actions), that the human will has things perfectly up to itself. But then come the second thoughts: What is meant by the will itself? If our wills are free, do they still obey us? And what is the connection between the us of our consciousness and the it of our wills? Who controls whom, and under what circumstances? Let free will show up, and streetcorner scholasticism happens.

In addition to being a tough-nut problem, free will is also what you might call an iceberg problem, in the sense that whatever answer we give to it is usually connected to a larger mass of less visible assumptions about God and human nature. If the will is not free enough, we get a picture of human behavior that looks like puppets on a string, and a picture of God that looks like Miss Havisham. If it's too free, we get something that looks even less than human, "an erratic and jerking phantom" (in the words of Richard Taylor) "without any rhyme or reason at all," and a God who looks a good deal like Huck Finn's Aunt Sally.

As one of the most articulate popularizers of Calvinist theology today, R. C. Sproul does not like what he sees on the tip of the free-will iceberg. "A majority of professing evangelicals," complains Sproul in the introduction to Willing to Believe: The Controversy Over Free Will, have bought a careless and overoptimistic free-will-ism, and that has become linked to the even more ominous adoption of a happy-face anthropology whose fundamental conviction is "that human beings are basically good." It is not clear, from the way Sproul frames his complaint, whether it is defective thinking about free will that has trickled down to "a clear repudiation of the biblical view of human fallenness," or the other way around. Nevertheless, it is clear to Sproul that there is a great deal wrong with the way evangelicals talk about free will.

In technical terms, Sproul sees this as the result of a lamentable shift away from a monergistic concept of the relationship between human wills and God's (that is, that God is the single actor in regeneration) toward a synergistic concept (in which God assists and humans cooperate), which Sproul is clearly convinced is only a few paces removed from outright theological syncretism. Part of the reason for this shift, and part of the difficulty monergism has in making its case to modern evangelicals, is the popular perception that freedom and monergism are "either/or" quantities, as though monergism inalterably means that human actions are inconsequential and human wills possess no meaningful freedom, and as though synergism was (by elimination) the only option.

Sproul argues that what monergism opposes in synergism is not human freedom or moral responsibility but absolute human autonomy, "a degree of freedom that is unlimited by any higher authority or power," and which sits poorly beside the Christian idea of God as an eternal, creative, almighty being who moves people's hearts to act or to believe.

What this means, unhappily, is that Sproul has committed himself to telling two stories simultaneously, one about the psychological entity we call the will and how it operates, and the other about freedom and monergism, where the argument often runs toward ontological abstractions rather than telling us what a will looks like when it is free. Of the two, it's clear that the story about freedom has most of Sproul's attention.

Cast in the form of "an historical reconnaissance" of eight major writers (from Pelagius to Lewis Sperry Chafer), Willing to Believe never actually gets around to establishing what the will even is, which seems at the very least a strange omission in a book about free will. What Sproul does lavish his care upon is demonstrating through his "reconnaissance" how monergists have actually developed respectable definitions of human freedom without having to resort to synergism or free will.

The principal difficulty with this "reconnaissance" is that it rarely probes very deeply beneath the surface of its subjects. Despite Sproul's penchant for twirling Latin theological tags (the book includes a Latin theological glossary), all of the primary sources on Augustine are from nineteenth-century English translations, and his chapter on Pelagius is a summation of several antique secondary histories. There is also an unfortunate drift toward homogenization—to making all monergists say pretty much the same thing and in the same tone of voice. There is no attention here, for instance, to how Calvin made just the kind of conventional theological harmonization of freedom and monergism Sproul likes, but then also expressed a deep skepticism whether that harmonization would convince anyone who was not already convinced of the tremendous power of God and the equally tremendous impotence of humanity. "You ratiocinate, I admire; you dispute, I believe," was Calvin's ultimate reply to synergists in the sixteenth century who doubted the dominion of God over human wills, "Rather admire with me and exclaim: O the height and the depth! Let us agree to tremble together lest together we perish in error."

The temptation to routinize complex arguments has its worst effects when Sproul turns to two figures who, as a student of the late John Gerstner, he might have been expected to handle with more finesse. The first of these is Jonathan Edwards, whose Freedom of the Will (1754) is often read as though it were the urtext of American Calvinism. Oddly, Freedom of the Will was not, in strict terms, a theological book, since the most critical parts of Freedom of the Will were devoted to the psychology of the will and the logical inconsistencies of free-will-ism. What's more, Edwards's centerpiece argument about the will—that everyone possesses the natural ability to will freely (in that everyone can will and has the natural endowments to execute choices), but only those regenerated by divine grace possess a moral ability to will the good—generated deep and abiding suspicions among Old School Calvinists like Hodge and Warfield. For a century after Edwards's death Calvinist churches in America were racked with indecision over "Edwards on the Will" (it played a major part in the 1837 New School–Old School Presbyterian schism). None of this hinders Sproul from endorsing the natural/moral ability formula, despite the fact that this places him, rather strangely, on the side of the New Schoolers rather than the great Princetonians.

It also places him, even more strangely, on the same side as Charles Grandison Finney. Perhaps because Finney "is a hero" to the very "contemporary evangelical community" that he criticizes so strongly in his introduction, Sproul finds little in Finney "that is theologically orthodox," and a great deal that isn't. Finney not only reduced regeneration to simple decisionism, Sproul complains, but also heaved aside forensic justification, threw over any limitations on the extent of the Atonement, and defined human depravity out of existence. Sproul seems utterly unaware that Finney lauded Edwards as his great model and indignantly identified himself as a Calvinist in the struggle of Calvinism with "low Arminianism," and deployed precisely the argument Edwards had made on natural and moral ability throughout his great revival campaigns in upstate New York and New York City from 1826 to 1835 (and cited chapter and verse from Freedom of the Will to prove it).

That Finney had a particularly coarse and brash way of using Edwards is true, but it is also beside the point. Even Finney's notorious claim that revival was "a purely philosophical result of the right use of the constituted means and not a miracle" was simply to say what Edwards had said about human choices being the right responses to motives. Some of Finney's other unorthodoxies have similar Edwardian roots, although there is no account of them here, either. Sproul takes no notice of how Edwards's doctrine in Original Sin has no concept of immediate imputation, nor does he recall that in 1750 Edwards explicitly endorsed Joseph Bellamy's teaching on unlimited atonement as "the proper Essence and distinguishing Nature of saving Religion." Between too much homogenization and too little reading, Sproul falls unwarily into articulating notions of freedom and monergism which, oddly enough, don't differ all that much from Finney—kinder and gentler, perhaps, but still more like Oberlin than Princeton than he seems to realize.

If Sproul can be faulted for not reading far enough into the details, he also has to be faulted for leaving too many genuinely important things out. Sproul touches on none of the late medieval theologians (Bradwardine, Ockham, Biel) and major Calvinist confessions and catechisms to examine notions of willing and freedom, and takes only passing notice of one of the most influential Protestant summations of monergism, the Sententia (or canons) of the Synod of Dordt. He is also strangely silent on the modern free-will debate, where the drift of both high and low culture has been, not toward assertions of overweening autonomy, but toward no-fault victimhood, evolutionary determinism, and abuse excuses.

What is missing most, however, is a conclusion. The final chapter surveys the semi-Calvinism of dispensationalist theologians Lewis Sperry Chafer and Norman Geisler, but without any summary of the previous chapters and without the missing definition of the will. We are left instead at the end with the assumption that monergism has only to be reconciled to freedom to get piety. I suspect that this might have surprised our most famous monergist, John Calvin, who believed that piety would get you to monergism, and then you would stop worrying about freedom. "Our view is simply that [God] possesses by right such great power, that we ought to be content with his mere nod," Calvin wrote in De Aeterna Praedestinatione Dei in 1552. "Attend to who God is and who you are. He is God, you are man." Four and a half centuries later, I still don't know of a better place to begin talking about free will. CT

When God finds us

Kierkegaard said that most of us read the Bible the way a mouse tries to remove the cheese from the trap without getting caught. Some of us have mastered that. We read the story as though it were about someone else a long time ago; that way we don't get caught. But if we see the Bible as the story of the triumph of God's grace, the story of God searching for us, then look out. The story will come alive. God will find us and we will know that we are found.

God in me

Compassion lies at the heart of our prayer for our fellow human beings. When I pray for the world, I become the world; when I pray for the endless needs of the millions, my soul expands and wants to embrace them all and bring them into the presence of God. But in the midst of that experience I realize that compassion is not mine but God's gift to me. I cannot embrace the world, but God can. I cannot pray, but God can pray in me. When God became as we are, that is, when God allowed all of us to enter into the intimacy of the divine life, it became possible for us to share in God's infinite compassion.

Home mission

The greatest mission field we face is not in some faraway land. The strange and foreign culture most American evangelicals fear is not across the ocean. It's barely across the street. The culture most lost to the gospel is our own—our children and neighbors. It's a culture that can't say two sentences without referencing a TV show or a pop song, and that can't remember what it was like to have to get up and change channels. It's a culture more likely to have a body part pierced than it is to know why Sara laughed. . . . It's a culture that we stopped evangelizing, and have instead declared a culture war upon.

Words Against Weapons

Evangelicals, Catholics dialogue to help bring peace to violent Chiapas.

As the death toll in Mexico's blood-stained southern state of Chiapas continues to rise, Protestant and Roman Catholic church leaders are intensifying their efforts toward peaceful reconciliation.

Starting in 1994, the Zapatista Liberation Army launched an armed campaign against the Mexican government. The Zapatistas are demanding greater autonomy for Mexico's 8.7 million Indians, who are among the poorest ethnic groups in all of Latin America. Much of the bloodshed has been concentrated in Mexico's southern states, including Chiapas, along the border with Guatemala. About 500 peasants have died in the conflicts, both in attacks by the Zapatistas and reprisal killings by government supporters.

TENSIONS INFLAMED: Since September 1996, official peace talks have been stalled. Last year, killings on both sides persisted, including two evangelical lay church workers ambushed and slain in November and 45 Indians massacred on December 22 in the Chiapan village of Acteal. More than 50 people face charges in the Acteal killings, including the community's mayor, a member of the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), which has ruled Mexico since 1929.

The conflict has cut across many religious, political, cultural, and ethnic boundaries within Mexican society, and it has inflamed the long-simmering tensions between majority Roman Catholics and minority Protestant groups.

Evangelicals represent about 4 percent of Mexico's 96 million people. During the 1980s, evangelicals grew at three times the rate of population growth. Protestant evangelism has been concentrated not only in Mexico's cities, but also among Indian groups, which may be Catholic in identity, but are often animistic in their belief and practice. Pentecostals and Presbyterians are the two largest Protestant denominations in a country that is more than 80 percent Roman Catholic.

"Religious differences, especially between evangelicals and Catholics, are an exacerbating part of the conflict, but not a root cause of it," says Phil McManus of SIPAZ International, a Catholic peace-making organization based in Santa Cruz, California, which has been active in Chiapas. "You have instances of Catholics and evangelicals squaring off and fighting each other. But you'll find them fighting over things that have little to do with religion."

OPEN DIALOGUE: Starting in 1996, a group of church leaders launched a series of community-based dialogues in hopes of stimulating reconciliation and curtailing violence.

"When you get in a room and sit face-to-face and each tell your stories, it's difficult to think of them as your enemy," says Ken Sehested, executive director of the Baptist Peace Fellowship of North America, which is involved in the dialogues.

For 1998, another dialogue and a peaceful march are scheduled. Abdias Tovilla, a Presbyterian pastor, lawyer, and seminary director, says the talks are "the best way to abate the violence." As head of the Evangelical Human Rights Office in San Cristóbal de las Casas, Tovilla says, "The Zapatistas are pressuring evangelicals, Catholics, and [others] to join their movement. When people don't join, the Zapatistas threaten and kill."

Typically, the discussions are held over a three-day retreat, using alternating venues. Participants met at a Presbyterian seminary for the first meeting and at a Catholic diocesan facility for the second.

Slain mourned: Bishop Samuel Ruiz celebrates mass before the coffins of 45 villagers murdered in Chiapas on December 22.

REUTERS

CT Editor Emeritus Lindsell

In order to build community, attendees served meals and cleaned up the kitchen in mixed groups. McManus says, "It's a very human thing and breaks down some barriers."

REFUGEES FLEE: As the conflict has worsened, thousands of Indians have fled their family lands and villages across the mountainous Chiapas region.

Refugee squatter camps of Indians have popped up around San Cristóbal de las Casas, a major population center. One such camp contains 30,000 people, mostly evangelicals.

Well-armed villagers and private militias have often carried out reprisals against Zapatista supporters and others, forcing Indians to flee.

Baptist Peace Fellowship's Sehested believes that violence in Chiapas stems in part from paramilitary groups of conservative Chiapans seeking to hold on to the current political system that has marginalized the participation of Indians in politics and the economy.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION? Among evangelicals, the task of peacemaking has been made more difficult because they are internally divided over the root causes of the conflicts. Church leaders have difficulty agreeing on where economic and politically motivated strife ends and religious persecution begins.

While a longstanding animosity exists between faiths, Sehested says that what some evangelicals define as religious persecution by traditionalist Catholics, such as banishment from their villages, may be motivated more by economic and cultural issues.

But evangelicals are targeted in numerous communities. In San Juan Chamula, evangelicals have been marginalized for more than 30 years. Human-rights activist Tovilla says, "I feel that the caciques [local bosses] are bothered by the continued advance of the gospel in Chamula."

GRASSROOTS PEACEMAKING: In late January, the government released more than 300 Chiapan prisoners in hopes of reopening talks with rebel groups, but the Zapatista leader Subcomandante Marcos has rejected new talks.

Meanwhile, evangelical and Catholic leaders remain committed to their own talks. SIPAZ's McManus comments, "If grassroots church leaders who have moral authority in their communities get involved, they can have a real impact. The churches now potentially have a very large role to play."

By Deann Alford, with additional reports from Compass Direct.

"No one can know too much or be able to do too much," Harold Lindsell wrote in a book on missions published more than 40 years ago. Lindsell, in applying such counsel to his own life, wrote more than 20 books, becoming a potent force for growth and development of the evangelical movement.

Lindsell died January 15 in Lake Forest, California, after a long illness. He was 84. Lindsell served as CHRISTIANITY TODAY editor from 1968 to 1978. Subsequently, he became editor emeritus and a director on the board of the magazine's parent corporation, Christianity Today, Inc.

Under Lindsell's editorial supervision, CT played an important role in rallying evangelicals after the U.S. Supreme Court's 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling legalizing abortion. As an author, Lindsell is best known for his 1976 book, The Battle for the Bible, which documented and deplored the defection of noted evangelical institutions from belief in the inerrancy of Scripture. His series of annotated study Bibles, including the Harper Study Bible, Revised Standard Version, and his 1973 study of Christian ethics, The World, the Flesh, and the Devil, also have proved to be enduring in their popularity and scholarship.

FOND REMEMBRANCES: "I loved him as a brother," says CT founder Billy Graham. "He was a counselor to both Ruth and me. Many times I called him for advice." Ruth Graham credits Lindsell with being used by God to save her doubting faith when all attended Wheaton College.

Although ordained a Southern Baptist and possessing a solid academic pedigree, Lindsell never had any seminary training and never held a pastorate. Yet in important ways his peers saw in him the heart of a pastor and a man for whom prayer was second nature.

"He was a man of prayer who not only wrote about the subject, but lived it out personally," says Harold L. Myra, president of Christianity Today, Inc.

STORIED CAREER: Lindsell met Carl F. H. Henry, who preceded him as CT editor, when they were undergraduates at Wheaton College in Illinois. Lindsell served as best man at Henry's wedding, and the two served together on the faculties of Northern Baptist and Fuller Seminaries.

Lindsell sometimes came across as having a crusty demeanor. Backed by his firm convictions, he had been a debater in college, and throughout his life he thrived on enthusiastic exchanges of opinion, even at the family dinner table. Many found Lindsell remarkably tolerant. Coworkers liked his collegial bent as well. Arthur H. Matthews, who served on the CT editorial staff with Lindsell, hailed him as "the best boss I ever had."

At Columbia International University in South Carolina, then Columbia Bible College, Lindsell achieved his first academic post as history teacher and registrar.

There he met student Marion Bolinder, whom he later married. The Lindsells raised four children.

From there, Lindsell went to Chicago to teach at Northern Baptist Theological Seminary, then to Pasadena, California, where 50 years ago he teamed with Henry, Everett Harrison and Wilbur M. Smith as the founding faculty at Fuller. In addition to teaching missions and church history, Lindsell served as the seminary's first registrar, and later he became dean and then vice president. He left Fuller in 1964 to become associate editor of CT.

"In many ways, he remains a hero to us," says Richard Mouw, Fuller's president. "We believe that his indictment of Fuller on the inerrancy issue was unfair. At the same time, we continue to affirm the need for theological vigilance along with a better understanding of how to exercise it." Mouw added, "Now he and Dave can talk things over," referring to David Hubbard, the late Fuller president under whose tenure the seminary deleted biblical inerrancy from its statement of faith.

Although Lindsell's views on biblical revelation did not prevail at Fuller, they proved to be a catalyst for the conservative resurgence in the Southern Baptist Convention, the largest Protestant denomination in America. After The Battle for the Bible, Lindsell wrote a 1979 follow-up book, The Bible in the Balance. Lindsell is survived by his wife, four children, a sister and a brother.

God on the Box

PBS news show explores religion and ethics.

In 1994, as veteran NBC News reporter Bob Abernethy returned to the United States to retire after a five-year stint in Moscow, he pondered how to spend the rest of his life. He resolved to help television do a better job covering a long-ignored beat: religion.

"Even from 5,000 miles away, it was clear that there was a lot of growing attention in the U.S. to what was perceived as the problem of the national media ignoring religion," says Abernethy, who spent four decades at NBC. "It seemed there might be a niche for a national weekly half-hour news program on religion and ethics."

Abernethy, now 70, launched a one-man crusade that met resistance from networks and foundations. But when he called on the Public Broadcasting Service and the Lilly Endowment, both enthusiastically endorsed the idea. In 1995, Lilly gave two grants totaling $5 million, one of the largest donations to a single recipient in its history, enabling Abernethy to establish an office and begin work on the first year's 39 half-hour programs.

Last September, Religion & Ethics NewsWeekly debuted to little fanfare and sparse audiences. But in the past six months, the show has been receiving growing attention and acclaim for its mix of news and features. Abernethy says the program is the first of its kind not funded by a religious institution.

BROAD, BALANCED COVERAGE

AGE: Similar in some ways to PBS's nightly News Hour, the weekly show begins with a summary of religion news from around the world before examining a few topics at greater length in feature stories and roundtable discussions. Each program closes with a calendar segment, which explains the meaning and relevance of forthcoming religious celebrations and holidays.

Some roundtable discussions in early episodes zigged and zagged more than they zinged. Still, the show has made significant improvements, even if it still falls somewhat short of Abernethy's goal of rivaling nightly newscasts.

While network news producers usually require compelling arguments to give a story three minutes on the nightly news, Religion & Ethics NewsWeekly has lavished up to nine minutes on bigger features, enabling viewers to understand believers' faith and values.

Thus far, the show has focused on a dizzying variety of religious trends and subjects, including Promise Keepers, research on prayer and healing, gospel performer Kirk Franklin, television's portrayal of Catholic clergy, physician-assisted suicide, the Salvation Army, the growing popularity of Eastern Orthodoxy, religion and sports, worldwide persecution of Christians, and school vouchers. Kim Lawton, formerly Washington editor of CHRISTIANITY TODAY, is the program's news editor.

A moving segment in December focused on the Community of Jesus, an Orleans, Massachusetts-based largely Protestant group, and followed members as they went on their rounds of work and worship and interviewed them about their decisions to join the community and their deep commitment to Christ.

"I don't think you can cover religion unless you let people talk about what they believe, and we're a little more comfortable letting that happen than other news outlets may be," says Abernethy, who studied theology and social ethics at Yale Divinity School during a 1984 sabbatical.

"There is no stereotyping or major distortion like you frequently see in the press," says Roy Larson, director of the Gannett-Medill Center for Religion and News Media in Chicago. "It's good to hear reporters who know what they're talking about."

THE HARD PART: Getting the show up and running may have been the easiest component of Abernethy's crusade.

A more difficult assignment has been to convince independent PBS affiliates to air the program. A spokesperson for New York's WNET, which produces the program, says only 190 of the nation's 349 PBS stations carry it. Several larger markets, including Phoenix, Denver, and Houston, do not. In some markets where the program airs, it is in the wee hours of the morning.

The biggest challenge will be obtaining more funds to keep the show on the air after its 39-episode run ends in June. Programs cost an average of $100,000.

Jeanne Knoerle, program director for the Lilly Endowment's religion division, is optimistic. "We think this is a program that really needs to grow and be seen by more people, and that takes more time," she says.

People of strong faith may be uncomfortable with a show that gives fair and balanced treatment to all faiths but favors none. "We haven't been able to inspire a massive, organized support from national organizations down to individual congregations the way I had hoped," Abernethy says. WNET has created a free 20-page viewer's guide designed to help individuals and groups discuss the show. (It is available by writing the show at P.O. Box 245, Little Falls, N.J. 07424-0245.)

Richard Cizik, a policy analyst for the National Association of Evangelicals' Washington, D.C.-based Office for Governmental Affairs, gives Religion & Ethics NewsWeekly high marks. He says he is disappointed that evangelicals—who often complain about poor media coverage of religion—don't watch and support such a program.

"This program fills a void," says Cizik, "but it is editorially neutral and does not confirm evangelicals' prejudices. I would challenge our own community to view it not only as a chance to learn about the rest of the world but also as an opportunity to enter into dialogue with other faith communities."

LIFE CHANGING Power

Though many people think of the cross as a symbol of what Jesus did for us nearly 2000 years ago, Dr. LaHaye reveals through amazing stories that the cross is far more.

Discover how God is at work around the world redeeming broken lives and making them whole. Every story is unique, yet all have one thing in common: new life begins at the cross.

Groups Battle over Catholic Outreach

Despite an expanding dialogue between Roman Catholics and evangelicals on theological issues, conservative activists on both sides are not about to wave a white flag.

At a recent Ex-Catholics for Christ (ECFC) conference at Grace Community Church in Sun Valley, California, about three dozen demonstrators outside waved "Catholics for Christ" signs and distributed "Catholic Answers" tracts, which proclaim Roman Catholicism as Christ's one true church.

Meanwhile inside Grace Community Church, more than 500 former Catholics listened to leaders of ministries that evangelize Catholics. Condemnation of ecumenism between evangelicals and Catholics was a common theme. Speakers included Grace's pastor, John MacArthur; Word of Life's director, Joe Jordan; the Berean Call's Dave Hunt; and Good News for Catholics' Jim McCarthy.

The recent signing of "The Gift of Salvation" (CT, Dec. 8, 1997, p. 34) by Evangelicals and Catholics Together proponents holds little promise for opponents of the original ECT document. That controversial 1994 declaration, conceived by Prison Fellowship founder Charles Colson and Catholic priest Richard John Neuhaus of the New York-based Religion and Public Life, laid the groundwork for Catholics and evangelicals mutually recognizing each other as "brothers and sisters in Christ." Its purpose was to provide a framework for both sides to work more cooperatively within the pro-family movement.

Neuhaus told CT that Catholics and evangelicals "can agree on the meaning of salvation," and those who target Catholics for evangelism see the ECT project as "a serious threat to their niche market."

Nevertheless, inactive or nominal Catholics should be evangelized, Kent Hill, an ECT signatory and president of Eastern Nazarene College, told CHRISTIANITY TODAY. "Evangelicals ought to evangelize all nominal Christians, whether they are Catholic, Methodist, Presbyterian, Nazarene, or Baptist."

BLURRED THEOLOGY? For former Catholic Jim McCarthy, author of The Gospel According to Rome (Harvest House, 1995), differences in Protestant and Catholic theology remain his central concern.

"Our doctrine prevents us from accepting each other as brothers and sisters in Christ," he says.

At the conference, Good News for Catholics (www.gnfc.org) distributed, among other materials, a deck of flash cards, each with a belief commonly held by Catholics as a basic requirement for salvation. The reverse side of the cards give Bible verses, intended to dispute Catholic teaching on such subjects as the sacraments, church attendance, and keeping the Ten Commandments.

Catholic activists have been quick to respond to these doctrinal challenges from evangelicals. Catholic apologist Karl Keating, focusing on McCarthy's controversial video, Catholicism: Crisis of Faith, has accused McCarthy of using deceptive tactics to promote sales.

"It is cunningly packaged to look like a Catholic video for a good reason," Keating wrote in a recent review. "Its producers want to get it into the hands of unsuspecting Catholics."

In a related development, the Eternal Word Television Network, founded by Mother Angelica, has a new show, The Journey Home. The program highlights the stories of Catholic or Protestant backsliders returning to the "Mother Church."

The zeal among some evangelicals and Catholics is a byproduct of the signing of the ECT documents, says Mike Gendron of Proclaiming the Gospel (www.pro-gospel.org). Gendron believes that ECT has muddled "the biblical distinctions of the gospel and set the mission of the church back 500 years." He says, "If [ECT] is sustainable, then its endorsers must declare the Reformation was a terrible mistake and the martyrs who died defending the gospel died in vain."

But Neuhaus considers such talk "uncharitable" and "a sin against the living Christ who calls Christians to exercise grace with one another." Indeed, says Neuhaus, the Council of Trent "did not fully understand the intent of the Reformers. We can't go back to the sixteenth century and untangle it. We have discovered that when we encounter one another now, we can say we are in agreement on the meaning of salvation."

Some evangelical leaders who are supporters of ECT remain firmly committed to interaction with Catholics. Recently, Jack Van Impe, author, prophecy teacher, and broadcaster, spent the entire broadcast of Jack Van Impe Presents defending Pope John Paul II as a man of God. He warned that the next pope could be the false prophet of the Book of Revelation. "We've got to stick together as brothers and sisters in Christ," he says.

Church Leaders Refocus on Ethics

For the past two years, Nigeria has ranked as the world's most corrupt place to do business, according to an independent survey of global business executives. But recently, thousands of church leaders gathered to take aim at the country's corruption problems and agreed to stop shifting blame to political leaders for society's problems.

"In Christian ethics, it is never wrong to do right and it is never right to do wrong," said James Ukaegbu, chair of the four-day Congress on Christian Ethics in Nigeria. More than 2,000 Nigerian Christian leaders have signed a new covenant recommitting themselves to biblical truth and ethics. The covenant reads in part: "We pledge to submit to the lordship of Christ, leadership of the Holy Spirit, and authority of God's word in every part of life."

GRACE WITHOUT REPENTANCE: "Although the church in Africa is experiencing tremendous numerical growth, it has failed to halt Africa's moral degeneration," said Goffried Osei-Mensah, deputy international team leader of African Enterprises. "The church has offered the grace of Christ to people without demanding thorough repentance. This has resulted in a lack of moral transformation."

"Covenant signers standing together is particularly important in view of the fact that many of the millions of strongly moral-minded Christians in Nigeria feel alone when it comes to open resistance to the massive extortion that surrounds us," said pastor Garry Maxey.

The covenant focuses on transforming society through Christian ethics. "We pledge to develop and maintain our families according to the principles of God's Word which prescribe marriage of one man to one woman for life," the document states. "We will practice faithfulness and fidelity by forsaking fornication, adultery, homosexuality, and all other forms of sexual abuse. We shall rear our children in the fear and admonition of the Lord."

The military government has taken notice of this movement. It has set October 1998 as its date for the return of civilian rule. Nigeria's Lt. Gen. Jeremiah Useni says the forum not only identified problems in the church and the country, but also promises to "realign this nation morally and spiritually."

Racial Reconciler Spencer Perkins

Spencer Perkins, an emerging leader in the racial-reconciliation movement, died January 27 at his home in Jackson, Mississippi, of heart failure. Perkins, 43, is survived by his wife, Nancy, and three young children.

Perkins's father, evangelical leader John Perkins, 65, issued a statement saying, "Spencer now sees clearly what I still see only dimly through a glass.

"Spencer is the one who invited me to Sunday school in 1957, out of which I came to know Jesus Christ," his father said.

Perkins

Wayne Gordon, who co-founded the Christian Community Development Association with John Perkins, said, "It's the wrong time in his life for [Spencer] to leave us. A few months ago, we were prepared for John to die." The elder Perkins has had successful surgery for prostate cancer.

Gordon said that Spencer, with his writing and speaking partner, Chris Rice, had forged "the most dynamic, deepest, strongest black-white relationship in the country—there's none like it."

Rice and Spencer Perkins directed the International Study Center of the Voice of Calvary Ministries, founded by John Perkins in the early 1970s in Jackson. The twosome served as top editors for Reconcilers magazine (formerly Urban Family) to champion the message of racial reconciliation and community development among evangelicals. In 1993, they coauthored More Than Equals: Racial Healing for the Sake of the Gospel (IVP).

At the funeral, Rice gave an emotional remembrance of his "yokefellow." Rice said, "I stand before you as a witness that racial reconciliation is possible."

Just three days before his death, Perkins blacked out while at an ethnicity and reconciliation conference hosted by Reconcilers Fellowship. He recovered from what turned out to be a diabetic seizure and insisted on delivering his closing address to the gathering. "Spencer outlined a new vision for a higher level of reconciliation—a call to radical grace among the races," recalls Rice. "He had been eager to deliver this message, and we thank God that he did."

The John M. Perkins Foundation (P.O. Box 32, Jackson, MS 39205) has established the Perkins' Children Fund for the children's educational expenses.

Christian Coalition Retrenches

The financially strapped Christian Coalition has severed ties with subsidiaries geared to reach Catholics and blacks, as well as ceased publication of its flagship magazine. Contributions fell 36 percent from a record $26.4 million in 1996 to $17 million in 1997.

Layoffs have reduced the coalition staff from 110 to 90. The downsizing comes in the wake of last June's departure of political wunderkind Ralph Reed (CT, July 14, 1997, p. 60). The organization founded by Pat Robertson has had a lower profile under its new leaders, Randy Tate, a former congressional representative, and Donald Hodel, a former Reagan cabinet member.

In January, the Christian Coalition spun off the year-old Samaritan Project, which had focused on the poor and disadvantaged minorities (CT, June 16, 1997, p. 66). Earl Jackson, who remains director of the independent Samaritan Project, says it had difficulty being perceived as genuinely interested in minorities while under the Christian Coalition umbrella.

Also in January, the Catholic Alliance ended all financial ties to the Christian Coalition. Since the break, prominent Catholics such as former baseball commissioner Bowie Kuhn and Domino's Pizza chief executive officer Tom Monaghan have joined the board.

"The Catholic Alliance now will be an authentically Catholic voice in public-policy debates and able to mobilize Catholic voters and public opinion," says Keith Fournier, president of the group. Legal separation between the two groups came two years ago (CT, May 20, 1996, p. 76).

The coalition also has ceased publication of Christian American, a glossy, four-color magazine. The advertising-supported bimonthly that had been mailed to 400,000 subscribers will be replaced with a more frequent newsletter.

Spokesperson Arne Owens says the moves will allow the coalition to return to its original focus of training people of faith to become more active in politics.

"We're reorganizing and refocusing programs around the core mission of grassroots activism," Owens says. "We believe the moves we made have been necessary to place the organization on a sound footing financially."

Tate and Hodel are considering the addition of a political action committee. The IRS has investigated whether coalition voter guides violated the ban on partisan politicking by tax-exempt groups.

In another development, Jeanne DelliCarpini, the former top financial officer at the Christian Coalition, received a six-year suspended sentence on January 22 after confessing to embezzling $40,346. Circuit Court Judge S. Bernard Goodwyn ordered DelliCarpini, 43, to repay the money she had taken in 1996 and 1997. [CT]

Adventist Doctor Targets Smoking

Research by Adventist doctor Linda Ferry shows that smokers using the drug bupropion are twice as likely to quit smoking.

Ferry, associate professor at Loma Linda University in Riverside, California, began to study the link between nicotine and depression in 1990 and discovered that a third of smokers are depressed. She eventually found that the antidepressant bupropion is effective in helping smokers to quit.

Richard Hart, dean of the School of Public Health at Loma Linda, says Ferry's research has provided "a major new tool" in the battle to stop smoking. "About 420,000 die every year from smoking in the U.S., more than from any other cause of death. If we get the word out to use bupropion, up to 300,000 will not die this year."

More than 175,000 prescriptions have been issued for bupropion, sold under the brand name Zyban, since its approval by the Food and Drug Administration last July. [CT]

WORLDWIDE CHURCH OF GOD

Splinter Groups Dismiss Leaders

Founders of two splinter groups from the formerly heterodox Worldwide Church of God (WCG) have been booted by their own boards.

In December, the Church of God, International (CGI), of Tyler, Texas, revoked the ministerial credentials of Garner Ted Armstrong, who for 30 years was part of a WCG radio and TV saturation.

Armstrong created his own organization in 1978 after being excommunicated from the WCG by its founder, Herbert W. Armstrong, his father.

The CGI board said it pulled Garner Ted Armstrong's credentials in the wake of both a sexual harassment suit by a Tyler masseuse and the discovery that Armstrong had a five-year extramarital affair.

According to Bronson James, secretary of the CGI's ministerial council, the organization "will continue to do the work of the church in a freer fashion than before, without a cult of personality" that had grown up around Armstrong. "It was painful to have to exercise biblical judgment" of Armstrong's actions, he says, "but it was a wake-up call for all of us."

Armstrong has started an "evangelistic association" in Flint, Texas, and has tried to rally support via mass mailings and an Internet-based campaign.

On January 20, in a separate development, the United Church of God (UCG) in Arcadia, California, fired its president, David Hulme. A former presenter on the WCG's World Tomorrow television program, Hulme led a movement to start the UCG in 1995, winning an estimated 17,000 WCG members dissatisfied with the older church's doctrinal shifts to orthodoxy (CT, June 16, 1997, p. 66). Hulme's dismissal involved differences regarding a plan to move headquarters to Cincinnati.

Storm Disaster Galvanizes Church

The most expensive natural disaster in Canadian history mobilized Christians as never before. The five-day eastern Canada ice storm in early January left more than 3 million people without power in Quebec alone. In some storm-ravaged areas, it took up to three weeks to restore power.

As the blackout persisted and temperatures plummeted to below zero, authorities went door to door evacuating citizens in danger of hypothermia or carbon monoxide poisoning from makeshift heating sources.

Church members spontaneously helped through an informal network of family and friends. Those with electricity or wood-burning stoves hosted those needy residents without heat. Potlucks became feasts as Christians shared the contents of thawing freezers.

The Salvation Army reacted quickly, opening up shelters in four Montreal-area churches and organizing four mobile canteens to dispense meals and hot beverages to storm victims, repair crews, and Canadian army personnel who had been called in to help.

Other churches with electric power or generators turned their buildings into temporary lodging. Church-sponsored food banks expanded to meet demand, congregations collected nonperishables, and many Canadian denominations established storm-relief funds.

Pro-Life Activist Ordered to Jail

Pittsburgh Judge Raymond A. Novak ordered pro-life activist Joan Andrews Bell to Allegheny County Jail for 3 to 23 months on January 15 for refusing to sign a probation form promising to stay away from abortion facilities.

Bell, a 49-year-old Roman Catholic from Bayonne, New Jersey, has been arrested 200 times, and in the 1980s spent almost two years in solitary confinement in a Florida prison.

The criminal trespass case arises from a May 1985 passive resistance sit-in Bell and 14 others conducted inside Women's Health Services in Pittsburgh. She barricaded herself in an examination room of Women's Health Services, unwrapped sterilized instruments, and refused to leave. Police had to cut the lock on the door and drag her out after she went limp. Novak originally sentenced Bell to three years probation in 1988, with orders not to trespass at abortion facilities. Bell refused, and Novak ordered her arrest last fall.

"I will not obey unjust laws nor consent to cooperate with the murder of the sacred lives of God's precious children," she says.

Bell's attorney Richard Traynor maintains that "Pennsylvania law prohibits the court from requiring the defendant to violate her conscience by assenting to a formal condition of probation."

At the end of her court case in January, Bell had to be carried from the courtroom by sheriff's deputies.

President Disillusions Christians

In 1991, Frederick Chiluba, as Zambia's newly elected evangelical president, declared the southern African country of 10 million a "Christian nation." He promised to fight corruption and to infuse biblical values into the country's political life.

But today, outspoken critics—increasingly including some evangelicals—say the 54-year-old Chiluba is vindictive against political opponents and tolerates corruption within the government.

Critics see a wide gap between Chiluba's religious rhetoric and his political practices. "Chiluba is saying good words but doing evil deeds," says Akashambatwa Lewanika, who served in Chiluba's cabinet in 1991 and is now an opposition leader. "He is proclaiming universal Christian love, but persecuting [the opposition] with personal hatred and vicious vengeance."

Chiluba has come to his own defense. When the Zambian National Assembly opened in January, Chiluba said, "My government has clearly demonstrated its determination to change the face of this country for good and the better."

Frederick Chiluba

VINDICTIVE POLITICS? Critics cite Chiluba's treatment of 73-year-old Kenneth Kaunda, who led the country for its first 27 years, as evidence of vindictiveness.

Kaunda, irked by a Chiluba-endorsed law that barred him from running in the 1996 elections, mounted an international campaign to discredit Chiluba's rule. On several occasions, Kaunda's statements appeared to incite public disorder. In August, Kaunda suffered injuries in a confrontation with police, and he claimed Chiluba had plotted an attempt on his life, a charge the president has denied.

Then, in October, Kaunda predicted that an "explosion" would rock the country. A few days later, some soldiers seized the country's radio station and claimed they had toppled Chiluba because of government corruption and chaos. The dissidents held the radio station for three hours and attacked the homes of top military officers, but the army quickly subdued them.

Afterwards, Chiluba invoked state-of-emergency powers, which allow police to arrest and detain suspects for 28 days without a court hearing. Police arrested 90 opposition figures allegedly linked to the coup. On Christmas Day, police surrounded Kaunda's residence and whisked him to prison.

"People are upset and disillusioned because they don't know who will be arrested next," says Nevers Mumba, an evangelical leader who had been a confidant of Chiluba but now leads the opposition National Christian Coalition. "What has happened is humiliating to this nation."

After international pressure, Chiluba released Kaunda, but placed him under a gag order and house arrest. Police cut off Kaunda's phone lines, fenced his residence with barbed wire, and camped outside his house.

During his own reign, Kaunda had arrested Chiluba, who became a Christian in jail. Now, Chiluba insists he is upholding the country's constitution, not seeking revenge. "You cannot break the law and expect to stay free," he says of Kaunda's actions.

CORRUPTION TOLERATED? Chiluba is also criticized for failing to control his money-hungry ministers, who drive expensive cars and own choice land. Mumba claims the country's political system is a haven for corrupt officials, an accusation that has been growing the longer Chiluba is in office (CT, April 3, 1995, p. 94).

Still, some evangelicals are solidly behind Chiluba. "He has the interest of the nation at heart," says Joshua Banda, vice president of the Assemblies of God, the country's largest evangelical group. "He has brought about an enhancement of democratic ideals in the nation." Chiluba worshiped at Banda's church the Sunday after Kaunda's arrest.

Some critics contend that Chiluba has kept key Christian leaders in tow by doling out cash. Human-rights activist Ngande Mwanajiti says church leaders only make public comments "when appealing for funding from the president for their churches."

Church leaders also shy away from directly challenging Chiluba because they fear losing privileges. Chiluba's government issues diplomatic passports to top clergy, but Mumba's was withdrawn when he criticized Chiluba's government.

FUTURE VISION: Christian leaders say Chiluba has not been effective in assuring that when he leaves office the country's citizens will have a firm grounding in Christian ideas and ethics.

Until late last year, church leaders assumed that Chiluba's then vice president, Godfrey Miyanda, would be Chiluba's successor. Miyanda, a retired general and a Christian, is popular in evangelical circles. But Chiluba stunned the Christian community when he dropped Miyanda from the vice presidency and offered him the politically low-profile post of education minister.

Besides Chiluba, Miyanda was the only visible Christian in the ruling Movement for Multiparty Democracy (MMD). Miyanda does not have enough clout in the MMD to clinch the presidential nomination without an endorsement from Chiluba. And Christians fear the next president may care little about Christian values.

Banda says he is consoled by the preamble to the country's constitution, which says Zambia "shall be a Christian country." Backed by such a statement, Christians can pressure the government to uphold Judeo-Christian values, Banda says. "But this is a matter for serious prayer."

The Bulgarian Evangelical Alliance, a member of World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF), has been granted official registration, which will allow the organization to operate legally throughout the country.

"The wait has been a long one of many years, but not in vain," says Johan Candelin, director of the WEF Religious Liberty Commission.

The registration process began in 1993 in response to a growing anti-evangelical campaign and efforts to restrict the influx of new "sects" into Bulgaria. Escalating media attacks confused evangelical churches with non-Christian sects. Evangelical churches existed in Bulgaria prior to its liberation from Turkey nearly 150 years ago. Lyubomir Mladenov, director of the Directorate of Denominations at the Council of Ministers in Sofia, also promises to grant official registration rights for seminary training for evangelical pastors.

"This is further proof that religious rights are gaining a stronger foothold in the country," says Jun Vencer, international director of WEF. "The greatest challenge ahead will be to soften public attitude, which is still very much against the small Protestant churches."

Nikolay Nedelchev, general secretary of the Bulgarian Evangelical Alliance, says the signing of the December 16 document granting legal status will have a profound impact. "We can open Bible schools, we can have bank accounts, we can buy property," Nedelchev says. The approval will also enable the alliance to conduct humanitarian aid and to organize training conferences. CT

VENEZUELA

Government Recognition Demanded

Venezuela's evangelical churches are demanding that the government recognize their right to exist and guarantee their freedom of worship.

Problems between evangelicals and Nestor Luis Alvarez, Venezuelan minister of worship, flared after the government last year expelled foreign Unification Church activists. Several Latin American governments have expelled Unification missionaries under pressure from Catholic and Protestant groups (CT, Nov. 17, 1997, p. 76).

In the wake of the expulsions, congressional representative Godofredo Marin has accused Alvarez of blocking the legal recognition of 4,000 churches and religious groups, most of them evan-

NIGERIA

Muslims Aim to End Televangelism

While several Nigerian Muslims have converted as a result of a regional evangelistic outreach by the Christian Broadcasting Network, other Muslims are actively seeking to stop the telecasts from airing in other parts of the country.

Popular artists, athletes, and professors gave testimonies on WorldReach Nigeria, which aired the first week in December. Around 2,000 churches in Nigeria supported the effort.

However, Muslim leaders have succeeded in stopping the telecast in the Sokoto, Kano, Maiduguri, and Kebbi States in northern Nigeria.

Muslim leader Usman Jibrin, a former military governor of Kaduna State, warned that Muslims will not tolerate the shows because they are "against Islam." Several sheiks have claimed the show is deliberately aimed at fomenting religious crises.

Death threats have been received by some Muslims who have made Christian commitments. Also, the WorldReach Nigeria staff and some Christians at Nigerian television stations have been threatened in connection with their evangelism.

"Some of the participants in WorldReach have suffered harassment, assault, and intimidation for their faith," says pastor Ina Omakwu, director of WorldReach Nigeria. Saidu Dogo, secretary-general of the Christian Association of Nigeria, an umbrella association for denominations, says the government must help "resist the pressures being mounted by Muslims to retard the propagation of other religions in the guise of peace and security."

gelical. The legislator has joined some evangelical churches in accusing Alvarez of serving as "an arm of the Roman Catholic Church." Around 85 percent of Venezuelans claim to be Catholic.

Alvarez says there is no religious discrimination or persecution in the country. However, he says all church bodies must meet certain legal norms, including having a hierarchy and a legal representative.

"No state can allow informal groups of a religious nature to be present and act in the country who do not provide authorities with a legitimate interlocutor," the minister told El Universal. Alvarez says the government often has had difficulty identifying church representatives to contact on legal matters.

Alvarez, in a veiled reference to the Unification Church, also says the government has a duty to preserve the security of the state against outside groups that might threaten its stability. CT

Early-morning pickup: James delivers a cassette to an interstate commuter.

Drive-Through Church: Food for Soul

Saint David's Anglican Church, with property facing a busy six-lane highway in Sydney, had problems making its presence known until rector Richard James came up with an idea. If drivers can pick up fast food for their bodies, why not a drive-through with food for the soul?

Thousands of commuters pass the little church in suburban Forestville each day. They often must slow down because of congestion. A sermon cassette tape to listen to on the way to work could relieve frustration and boredom, James figured.

Results have exceeded expectations. James and church members distributed hundreds of tapes to motorists who pulled into the church's circular driveway from 7 to 9 A.M. for three days in November and December.

The congregation, with about 150 regular attendees, supports the drive-through days enthusiastically. On distribution days, a team of about two dozen helpers gathers at 6:30 A.M. to pray and organize signs to let motorists know the drive-through is open.

Topics tackle real-life issues. James called the first series "Sex, Lies, and God." The second series, "The Meaning of Life," came from the Book of Ecclesiastes.

The next drive-through is planned for Easter.

ECUADOR

Mormon Church Suspends Construction

A Mormon congregation has suspended the construction of a church building in northern Ecuador after vandals damaged the structure twice.

Church officials say the project has been put on hold until a local plebiscite decides the question of the group's presence in Peguche, an indigenous community 80 miles north of the capital, Quito.

Opposition to the church came from indigenous leaders who charged that Mormons are intent on changing cultural and social conditions in the community.

Carmen Yamberla, president of the Indigenous Federation of Imbabura Province, says, "Freedom of worship cannot be exercised when it leads to social conflicts."

Yamberla says Mormons have infiltrated the community, caused division, and disregarded the development of indigenous people.

Another resident, José

Quimbo, charges that the church's architecture would conflict with the traditional adobe construction.

Quimbo says the traditional celebrations and rituals of the community would be disrupted by the presence of a church that would hold the entire population of Peguche.

Holger Moncayo, legal representative for the Mormon Church in Ecuador, says that the cement structure would seat 700 people, slightly more than the number of Mormon believers registered in three towns in the area.

But the issue is more than just the building, Quimbo says. "Our children will not know if their heritage is as a Mormon or as an indigenous person who speaks Quechua with a cultural identity forged for centuries."

Moncayo denies that Mormons are trying to change culture. "We ask that our members maintain their traditions, their hair braids, and their good customs."

Arrest warrants have been issued for four residents who have been charged with destruction of the church property.

No message is more important. relationship is everything.

RECENTLY, ONE OF OUR STUDENTS, JOHN-PAUL LOTZ, was struck and pinned in his car while entering the freeway. Several surgeries and many days in the hospital followed. Knowing that he was hundreds of miles from home, the Beeson Divinity School family responded with an outpouring of love and support. Reflecting on this, John-Paul, who was born in Switzerland and studied in Germany, summed up his experience in three German words, "Beziehung macht alles," "relationship is everything."

I CAN THINK OF NO MESSAGE MORE IMPORTANT for theological education today—"relationship is everything." The mission of Beeson is to prepare persons whom God has called to be ministers of the Gospel for service in the Church of Jesus Christ. This requires a serious engagement with the primary documents of the Christian faith, a deep understanding of our historical and theological foundations, as well as the ability to read the culture and boldly proclaim God's Word. But books, classrooms, and computers do not by themselves a theological community make! This requires regular worship of the Triune God and cultivation of spiritual disciplines for faculty, students, and staff alike.

NO ONE CAN BE A MINISTER OF the Gospel alone. All too often the culture of theological education reinforces patterns of isolation and competition. Our job is to nurture relationships so that every student may grow toward full maturity in Christ. Focus on relationality does not mean capitulating to the therapeutic culture with its "touchy-feely" techniques. It does mean taking time to listen, pray together, read God's Word, and celebrate His presence in worship. When this happens, the chapel will become as important as the library, the prayer closet as prized as the computer lab.

SUMMER • PROGRAMS

Extremists

Well, so they don't look like extremists. But learning can be an extreme risk, especially when it's life-transforming.

Join us this summer in an international community of fellowship and worship for extreme study and play. Learn during our Postmodernity Seminar (May 25-June 5) with Larry Crabb and Stan Grenz. Study during our Summer School (June 29-July 31) with Craig Barnes, Marva Dawn, Colin Gunton, James Houston, Tremper Longman III, Eugene Peterson, Alvin Plantinga and Luci Shaw, and more.

This summer, come to Regent. And enter the world of the extremists.

MAKING THE WORLD YOUR CAMPUS

*Attending a

Is it possible for a small Christian college in Pennsylvania to offer its students a specialized class on filmmaking, held in—where else—Los Angeles, the entertainment capitol of the world? Is it possible for a small mid-western Christian college located in farm country to offer students the opportunity to spend part of their college careers studying public policy in—where else—the nation's capital? Is there any Christian college that has extension campuses in Central America, Russia, England, Los Angeles, the Middle East, and Washington, D.C.?

The answer to all of the above questions is yes, and the answer is yes because of the several specialized academic programs offered by the Washington, D.C.-based Coalition for Christian Colleges and Universities (cccu) and open to all ccu schools. Students at Christian colleges need not choose between the intimacy of a small-college atmosphere and the intensity of specialized academic experiences.

Extension campuses around the world

The ccu is now home to 91 member institutions, their enrollments ranging from about 400 to about 6,000. But there is another way to crunch the numbers. For purposes of offering specialized academic and cultural experiences, the ccu could be viewed as a single "megauniversity" with 1.3 million alumni and a total current enrollment of over 158,000.

The ccu has proved the truth of the maxim "The whole is greater than the sum of its parts." The fact is that few if any of the ccu's 91 member schools could do individually what they have been doing, and will continue to do, together.

Says ccu program manager Margery Bernbaum, "Our institutions recognize that by being a member, they gain what amounts to extension campuses in the U.S. and abroad." Indeed, the programs function like extension campuses. Students get academic credit from their own school, but they study at a remote location.

Says Bernbaum, "I get many, many letters from students who say to us, in essence, 'I learned so much in the classroom, but I didn't really own it until I went on this program.'"

In all, the ccu offers—or will soon be offering—nine specialized study opportunities in the U.S. and abroad.

• In the fall of this year, the CCCU will inaugurate yet another "extension campus," this one in Oxford, England. The Oxford Honors Program is based on a partnership with the Centre for Medieval & Renaissance Studies, which is affiliated with Keble College of Oxford University. The Oxford program is open to honors students at CCCU institutions. They have the opportunity to design their own programs based on the field of study and special interest. The experience includes opportunities for one-on-one tutorials with Oxford dons. Built into the program is a strong emphasis on the integration of faith and learning.

• In addition to the semester-long study opportunities, the CCCU offers two summer study programs, one in Oxford and one in Washington, D.C. The D.C. program, the Summer Institute of Journalism, gives students the opportunity to combine classroom work with hands-on newsgathering and -writing experience, as well as the opportunity to interact with some of the nation's top news journalists.

Each of the study opportunities offered by the CCCU has a character all its own, yet all share a common purpose. That purpose goes far beyond merely studying the same topics at a different location. Each program is designed to transport students from academia to the real world.

Without downplaying the importance of theory and classroom learning, the programs help students understand that their Christian faith is not just theoretical in nature. Rather, it has immensely practical implications for their lives, and especially for how they will choose and pursue a career in their area of interest. While many students may know this, having the chance to experience it through one of these specialized programs is typically a life-changing experience.

Applying Christian faith in the nation's capital

The cccu considers its American Studies Program its flagship program—it has been around the longest, since 1976. The letters the cccu receives from program participants confirm the fact that it is making a significant different in helping young people mature in their faith. Wrote a Taylor University student, "God has really used this semester powerfully to conform me even more to his image. I feel that I am a more committed, more disciplined, much less parochial Christian disciple for my time with the American Studies Program."

A student from Grand Canyon University wrote, "ASP has offset my misconstrued conceptions about myself and the world around me that would have been detrimental to my long-term effectiveness. Now, instead of having an idealistic framework, I have a more realistic one. Because of this, I am better prepared and excited to meet the stresses of life and the needs of the world around me; I can look into the face of the future and smile."

Such letters typify the experiences students have with ASP, says Jerry S. Herbert, the program's director since 1981.

The specialized academic offerings give young Christian men and women the chance to test the waters and to explore their interests.

According to Herbert, each semester there are many more applicants than the program can accommodate. That number is limited to 40. "In the mideighties," says Herbert, "we allowed it to get into the 50s, but we found that students began to lose the sense of community they experienced when we kept it to 40." According to Herbert, the purpose of the program has remained consistent from the beginning. That purpose is summarized by the recently adopted slogan: "Connecting Biblical Faith with Public Life and Vocation." Says Herbert, "Students who participate in this program encounter Christian leaders who are witnessing faithfully in areas not traditionally associated with Christian mission—for example, believers who are active in law, politics, and business. The program emphasizes the connection between Christian faith and vocation. We stress that Jesus is Lord both of our private lives and our public lives."

Students inevitably experience in the program a broadening of their concept of what it means to be a Christian. "They get a chance to meet other believers who are well grounded in their faith," says Herbert, "but who come from different backgrounds and who have different political viewpoints." He adds, "The students who do best in this program are the ones who are eager to discover God and who are also eager to learn."

Cultural dynamics and values

According to the cccu's Bernbaum, one important benefit of all of the cccu's special programs is that each offers students an in-depth cross-cultural experience. That is obviously the case when students spend time in Central America or Russia, Europe, China, or the Middle East. But in addition, Bernbaum says, both the nation's capital and the film capital of the world can in a very real sense be considered different cultures, defined in terms of distinctive world-views, customs, and priorities.

Bernbaum observes, "You find in Washington, D.C., a culture where power rules. It's an eye-opening experience for students encountering that culture for the first time. Part of the experience is the irony of seeing so many homeless and powerless people so near to the nation's center of power."

Likewise, the culture in which the

and with all your mind.*

LUKE 10:27 NIV

You've always respected your mind—but perhaps you've only just begun to glimpse its rich potential. As a thinker, a quester, and a Christian, you deserve a college that sharpens your intellect and cultivates your faith without compromising either one.

Ranked by U.S. News & World Report among the Midwest's top colleges and universities, Calvin College offers you a genuinely Christ-centered, thoroughly academic community: Good times. Good works. Good sports. And great minds.

Your mind. It's a gift. And Calvin is your place to use it.

Calvin College does not discriminate with regard to race, color, national origin, gender, or handicap.

THE RIGHT CHRISTIAN COLLEGE. THE RIGHT TIME.

THE RIGHT COLLEGE will help you grow into a person who can triumph over life's most difficult challenges. You do that with rigorous academic training and a broad support group of fellow students, mentors, and teachers. And you do that, most of all, with a deeply grounded faith.

Louisiana College's personal, student-centered approach will provide you with critical and creative thinking skills, proficiency in interpersonal relationships, the ability to write and speak articulately, and a stronger Christian faith.

PREPARATION FOR YOUR FUTURE

LOUISIANA COLLEGE has one of the highest percentages of graduates going on to graduate or professional school of any college in the South. Our Pre-Med students have, for more than 15 years, held a medical school placement record of nearly double the national average. LC's Pre-Law program has averaged 97% placement into law school for nearly 2 decades.

Many of our graduates are studying in MBA, music, social work and other graduate programs in major universities around the country. Religion students are superbly prepared for the rigors of the finest seminaries in the country.

Every Louisiana College nursing graduate has passed the state board exam to become a registered nurse. Since 1979 LC education majors have passed the National Teachers Exam at a 95% rate on their first try. Business graduates average scores on the National Business Exam routinely place in the top 10% in the nation.

THE RIGHT ENVIRONMENT

YOUR FAITH IS IMPORTANT, so we work hard to provide the atmosphere, programs, and activities to enable you to deepen that faith. Louisiana College is a Baptist college that welcomes and respects students of all faiths. At LC you will learn more than facts and theories. You'll learn to explore and affirm your beliefs — and your faith in God will grow through that exploration.

TEACHERS YOU'LL NEVER FORGET

LC PROFESSORS ARE selected for their academic qualifications and their Christian character. They know that education is a 24-hour-a-day process, so they often spend extra hours helping answer personal, spiritual, and academic questions after classes and late at night. At Louisiana College we'll get to know you and share your dreams.

THE RIGHT VALUE FOR TODAY'S ECONOMY

LOUISIANA COLLEGE'S cost is among the lowest of any Christian private college in the nation. In addition to our below average tuition costs, we distribute nearly $4 million annually in federal and state funds and private scholarships to more than 90% of our students.

That is why Louisiana College is regularly listed in Barron's Best Buys in College Education. We are also included in America's 100 Best College Buys: 1997-98.

film industry thrives is a culture all its own, though it is radically different from the culture on the Atlantic coast. Some Christians maintain that Hollywood's values and the values of the faith are incompatible; the CCCU's Los Angeles Film Studies Center program challenges that notion.

The purpose of the program is to enable Christian students from CCCU institutions around the country to become salt and light in the film industry. During their semester in L.A., students live in spacious corporate apartments near Burbank, just minutes away from Warner Brothers, Universal Studios, NBC, and Walt Disney Studios. The film center is equipped with classroom space, a small library, a collection of films on video, and labs for editing and other filmmaking activities.

Based on their opportunities to meet and interact with Christians who are active in the film industry, students come to realize that Christian values and the entertainment industry are not necessarily incompatible. In addition to course work and the opportunity to learn and practice filmmaking skills, students intern at Hollywood companies, giving them a real-life experience in the industry. Among other things, they have had the opportunity to read scripts and to influence decisions on which ones to buy and which to reject.

As with all the CCCU programs, the L.A. program emphasizes the relationship between faith and learning. Also like the others, it has proved to be a life-changing experience. "In a number of ways," states one student, "this semester has been my trip to Oz. While there are no yellow brick roads in this city, I have found myself on a journey of sorts. Instead of searching for the Wizard, I have been searching for God's plan for my future."

Another writes, "I've learned more being immersed in this environment than I ever could have

For over 75 years: the passion and spirit for the Great Commission.

"...several hundred miles nearer to China than other trade routes across the Pacific..." So read the 1926 catalog of Simpson College—pointing out the advantage of its Seattle location in accessing the unsaved in China.

Since then, our campus has moved—our evangelical focus has become global, but the passion and the spirit for the mission that ignited the college in those days burns as strong as ever. Throughout our history, we've kept our eyes on Jesus Christ and His church.

Innovative Programs

We offer 14 graduate and 28 undergraduate programs—some focused on full-time ministry, some geared to careers in other fields. But whatever the program, students benefit from our emphasis on individual spiritual formation as well as on preparation for church leadership.

They have countless opportunities for ministry—from missions work worldwide to service with churches and other organizations in this area.

Spiritual Formation

Leadership

Our sense of innovation is demonstrated through several programs, such as our master's in ministry and missiology offered in a modular format. Which means full-time professionals can pursue advanced studies during one-week sessions three times a year. Also our three-summer education program, a convenient way to earn a master's degree in education.

No wonder Simpson is expanding. Our increase in enrollment (including many married students) makes us one of the fastest growing colleges in the nation. We're also growing in facilities, continuing to add new buildings to our impressive campus in this wonderfully scenic region of northern California.

If you'd like to be part of all this—if you want to share in our mission, come join us. For more information, give us a call: 800-598-2493 or 530-224-5606.

The best of both worlds

In addition to being an outlet for students who have a specific area of interest, the CCCU's specialized academic offerings give young Christian men and women the chance to test the waters and to explore their interests. Some may find after spending a semester in Washington, D.C., or Los Angeles that they want to move in a different career direction. Though students are limited to a single semester per program, they may participate in more than one program.

Herbert, Bernbaum, and many others believe that the specialized academic and cultural opportunities offered by these CCCU programs go a long way toward helping students choose a Christian college. Admittedly, the Washington program is not a substitute for a specialized program in international law or domestic policy. Neither is the Los Angeles program a substitute for film school. But for the many young Christian men and women who graduate from high school each spring—as well as for their parents—acquiring a solid spiritual and intellectual grounding in the Christian faith remains a high priority.

The CCCU programs enable students to acquire that foundation without having to sacrifice specialized academic training and significant field experiences in their area of interest. They allow students to reap the benefits of a small-community atmosphere without becoming isolated from the world's many problems and exciting opportunities. In short, by giving Christian colleges—no matter how small—extension campuses around the world, the programs offered by the CCCU represent the best of both worlds.

Gallup released a poll not long ago showing that a bare 5 percent of Americans harbor "a great deal of confidence" in Congress—down from 42 percent just 30 years ago. When so many Americans see congressmen as self-seeking junketeers in the pocket of special interests, it's refreshing to know one who breaks the mold.

Frank Wolf (R-Va.) is not much at glad-handing, and he shies away from the limelight. For his serene optimism, critics have labeled him naïve. His travels are not the typical junkets to posh resorts or embassy parties but risky excursions to outposts ravaged by war and famine—especially to places where fellow Christians are persecuted for their faith.

His most recent journey took him to Tibet, where he posed as a tourist, eluded the tour guide by pretending to be ill, and then sneaked out to talk to Tibetans on the street for the real story of Chinese repression. Another expedition took him to Sudan, a nation waging a self-described religious war against its own citizens who are Christians or other non-Muslims through a campaign of torture, starvation, and murder. Sudanese soldiers are literally snatching children from their mothers' arms and selling them into slavery for the price of a few head of cattle. Girls are sold as concubines.

Wolf has journeyed to East Timor to report on massacres conducted by the Indonesian government. He has dodged bombs in Nagorno Karabakh. He has investigated conditions in El Salvador, Bosnia, and Ethiopia. Instead of enjoying the plush accommodations he could command as a government official, Wolf toughs it out with ordinary people for a first-hand sense of their plight.

Before the fall of the Iron Curtain, Wolf tramped throughout Eastern Europe championing for freedom. He was the first American official to bulldog his way into the notorious Perm Camp 35 in the Siberian gulag, where leading dissidents were imprisoned. Upon returning, he publicized the religious and political abuses they reported and arranged for me to join a second group visiting the camp. Due to Wolf's tenacity, the Soviets released many prisoners even before the USSR collapsed.

What makes this unusual politician so different? The secret is his Christian faith. His inspiration is William Wilberforce, the nineteenth-century British politician and passionate evangelical who spent his life crusading against the slave trade.

For his indefatigable efforts, Wolf has won grudging respect even from people on the opposite side of his conservative politics. Liberal columnist Mary McGrory calls him "a watchman on the rampart of world freedom." Former Democratic congressman Lionel Van Deerlin describes Wolf as one of "a special breed," who "seem attracted to public office to fulfill more than personal or political ends." Men like Wolf, he adds, "sustain a flicker of hope in the elective process."

Yet the reason we're writing this is not merely to spotlight a courageous Christian, nor to boost confidence in the political system. Rather, it's because Wolf and everything he stands for is about to be tested. And so are we.

Congress will soon be taking up the Freedom from Religious Persecution Act, introduced by Wolf with Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), which would impose sanctions on nations that persecute people for their religious faith—places like Sudan, Egypt, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Vietnam, and China. The act started out as a motherhood measure: Who could possibly be against protecting people from religious persecution? The bill quickly won widespread support, and congressional leaders promised to bring it to a vote.

But then a horde of lobbyists swarmed to Capitol Hill like bees from a hive, representing industries with big money at stake. Sanctions against Sudan? Why, that country is the world's leading supplier of gum arabic, a key ingredient in soft drinks and candy. How could Americans do without their Coca-Cola and Fanta? And China—that's a market of a billion people, who already do brisk business with Boeing.

Suddenly, members of Congress grew deaf to the horrors and human-rights violations perpetuated by these nations. Congressional leadership fell silent about scheduling a vote. The Clinton administration joined the opposition. The bill itself was watered down until what remains is largely symbolic.

Even so, the act remains a test of our values as a nation: Will we uphold the American commitment to defend inalienable rights, or will we sell out to a cash-register foreign policy? This is a defining moment for Frank Wolf, who stands in the gap on religious freedom, and for us all. What do we really believe as a nation? Are we willing to tolerate slavery? Will we continue giving aid to nations that burn churches, jail pastors, torture religious believers? Will we listen to big business and close our ears to the cries of those who are beaten and bleeding for their religious faith?

Or is there a point at which we draw the line?

If the Freedom from Religious Persecution Act is not passed, we will know that America has lost its capacity for even elementary moral outrage, that we have grown totally self-obsessed, that we are willing to sell our soul to feed our addiction to soft drinks and candy.

May it not be so.

Agent Mulder Does Art

INSIDE CT

The peripatetic Karen Mulder (who “curated” the gallery of Passion Week art that begins on page 42) experienced some culture shock as she moved from Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut, to Union University in Jackson, Tennessee, last September. But that was nothing compared to what she felt in 1991 when she moved from L’Abri Fellowship in the Swiss Alps to Southern California. For this native New Yorker, California seemed as strange as Libya, where she visited her parents numerous times while she was in college.

The daughter of an oil company executive, Karen grew up in Venezuela (she is fluent in Spanish) and Australia. Today, she continues to travel and speak all over the world—in China, Australia, England, the Continent. She is heavily involved in planning the arts workshops for “Loose in the Fire,” a two-week interdisciplinary conference to be held July 19 to August 1 in Oxford and Cambridge to commemorate the hundredth anniversary of C. S. Lewis’s birth.

Karen has been a key player in a number of efforts to connect and encourage Christians in the arts. She has been involved with the C. S. Lewis Foundation since 1991, and with Christians in the Visual Arts since 1986. In the early eighties she cofounded Christians in the Arts Networking (CAN)—an organization that got a great boost in membership thanks to a 1983 article by CT’s administrative editor, Carol Thiessen.

Karen has written about the arts for CT on many occasions and is serving as CT’s arts editor. Readers of arts journals will want to watch for her forthcoming article in Inklings on Sister Wendy, the accidental art critic who has re-engaged PBS viewers with painting. What does Karen think of this cultural arbiter in a wimple? Although she doesn’t agree with all of Sister Wendy’s artistic assessments, Karen is glad to see her warming the public’s heart towards art.

Like Sister Wendy, most of Karen’s preparation to teach art history is informal. (During her sojourn at L’Abri, she studied art history intensely.) But more recently, Karen spent two years in a more formal and rigorous setting at Yale’s Institute for Sacred Music and the Arts. There, as the Menil Scholar, she wrote a thesis on a living German stained-glass artist and was given the Aidan Kavanaugh Award for Distinguished Intellectual Achievement.

Now at Union University, Karen (who used to sail) is landlocked but loving it. Along with her specialized classes in art history and photography, she is teaching the art history and music history survey courses that all liberal arts students must take. “It’s my one chance to proselytize for the arts early on,” she says with evangelistic enthusiasm. LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

A Finite Elasticity

■ Roger Olson's article "The Future of Evangelical Theology" [Feb. 9] provided a helpful summary of the multifaceted divisions among evangelicals, although I think Tom Oden's challenge of Olson's traditionalist/reformist paradigm was a needed corrective. Olson was almost successful in writing in a non-pejorative fashion, but his sympathies appeared in general to line up with the reformists' emphases.

Oden's use several times of the term heresy reminds us that biblical error should be taken seriously, lest we be guilty of "dances with wolves." There are, indeed, occasions in which the right thing to do is to call someone to recant.

Someone needs to ask the question: at what point does one cease to be an evangelical? The term itself, like other words, has only a finite elasticity.

Prof. Larry Dixon
Columbia International University
Columbia, S.C.

■ I commend Roger Olson for his sincere desire for unity and peace in the evangelical movement, but despair at his statement that "the various positions in these evangelical debates do not themselves call into question our core commitments."

The core commitments of evangelicals have always included belief in God's omniscience, including his comprehensive knowledge of future events; we have always believed that, though it may be correct to say that God in some way responds to events in history, he is in not "in process" so as to be changed by them; we have always affirmed that the revelation of creation is not sufficient for the salvation of the lost and that they must hear the gospel of Christ in order to be saved. These and other core commitments are denied by some or all of those whom Olson terms reformist evangelicals.

I hope all evangelicals will realize that the long agreed-upon foundations of our faith are at stake in these matters and will respond with the uniquely Christian combination of kindness and firmness that is appropriate.

Pastor Ben Gildner
Wyoming Community Church
Wyoming, Minn.

Also, he should resist using such shrill language as "teeming infestation of heresy," "waning theological liberals," "demonic temptation," and "bewitchment." It reveals a temperament at odds with his commending of "charity" and "love and dialogue." And, I think, it betrays a lack of confidence in his own position.

Wes Davis
Lincoln, Del.

■ I will confine my remarks to a few observations concerning the fine section on evangelical theology: (1) There would be no traditionalists without reformers. Lutheranism is traditional. Luther was a reformer; (2) There can be no reformers without traditionalists. I'm not saying there must be a tradition in order to reform it—which is true nonetheless—but that there is a tradition of truth to reform those traditions that have strayed from it, which was established by God himself from the beginning; (3) God does not tell us everything. Our insistence that we know what God has not made clear is what divides us. We must be willing to admit that maybe we just don't know some things we think we know. (4) We all tend to delude ourselves to the effectiveness of our own theological ecclesiology. In a blind confession I requested of several confirmands in my church, only one would admit to faith in Jesus Christ; (5) Of my contact with members of other denominations, the doctrines that I find people know the best are the very ones that divide us. These last two items are pathetic. The only solution that demonstrates the unity between true believers is acknowledging the truth in the tension and how both sides are needed to complete the body of Christ.

Jim Pemberton
Statesville, N.C.

■ I am so thankful for the presence of so many evangelicals that I do not worry as I once did about the future of the group. In our growth, we make mistakes and take side trips, but the Holy Spirit is still working to guide us as we seek to understand the fullness of the inspired Word. In the early forties, I could not find a Bible-believing seminary, but look at the many we have today. When I began teaching Bible and theology, it was difficult to find reliable textbooks. How it has changed. We need to examine ourselves, but we need also to learn from one another as we seek to know God and his Word more fully.

Kenneth E. Jones
Louisville, Ky.

Roger Olson Responds

Oden's and George's responses to my essay seem to me somewhat overblown in terms of defensiveness and at times even border on offensiveness. They certainly do not bode well for the future of mutual respect, dialogue, and understanding among evangelicals who feel called to somewhat differing tasks. There is room within the evangelical theological community for both staunch defense of the Great Tradition of the church universal and ongoing examination of its details in light of God's Word.

What I find ironic is that both Oden and George are adherents of theological traditions that began with very controversial reforming achievements. Oden's Methodism was considered fanatical, sectarian, and even heretical (semi-Pelagian) by defenders of tradition during its infancy under the Wesleys in the eighteenth century. Even today some traditionalists reject it as inherently heterodox because of its denial of irresistible grace and affirmation of Christian perfection. George's Baptist tradition was looked upon the same way by almost all other groups of Protestants when it was budding in the seventeenth century and flowering in the eighteenth century. Both Methodist and Baptist traditions are essentially reforms of the Reformation tradition.

To slam the evangelical theological door shut on any ongoing reform today is ironic and inconsistent—especially from within these reforming traditions. While every evangelical ought to respect the great heritage of the universal church—especially the landmarks of early church doctrinal achievements and basic principles of the Protestant Reformation—above all, every evangelical ought to hold firmly to the sole supreme authority of God's Word. I fear we are in danger of falling into the error of two equal sources of absolute authority—Scripture and tradition. Questioning the authority of some part of tradition in no way makes one a “freelance religious thinker” disconnected from the life of the church. Instead, it can be the mark of a true servant of the church in helping it rethink its doctrines and reform its life in the light of God’s Word.

Christians’ Mental Health

► Congratulations on what is perhaps the best CT in recent years! I was particularly satisfied with Dwight Carlson’s article [“Exposing the Myth That Christians Should Not Have Emotional Problems,” Feb. 9]. My wife is a therapist with Meier-New Life Clinic here in Texas, and she and I have found it particularly challenging at times to convince well-meaning Christian people that it is OK to need the help of a Christian mental-health professional. The Carlson article and the Arterburn interview provide an articulate tool for educating church people who are suffering.

*Pastor Charles W. Christian
North Dallas Church of the Nazarene Dallas, Tex.*

As a pastor and Christian, I could become depressed reading this article. It’s plain to me that sin is the root of emotional disorders. If sin was not the problem and all is OK with the “patient,” why is any kind of therapy necessary at all? Sin is the problem if we define sin biblically. One definition is that sin is “falling short of the glory of God” (Rom. 3:23). Certainly people having emotional problems are falling, to some degree, short of the glory of God, Christian or non-Christian.

A second definition of sin is “Whatsoever is not of faith” (Rom. 14:23). Such was the case of Martin Luther’s depression—“the context of depression was always the same, the loss of faith that God is good and that he is good to me.” God’s remedy for depression or similar emotional problems is not counseling or therapy. It is to “put on the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness” (Isa. 61:3).

I gather from Carlson’s article that Luther confessed during one of his bouts with depression, “Christ was wholly lost.” Therefore, would not Christ be his answer? Why then is either counseling or therapy necessary? Except possibly to point the “patient” to Christ, who is our sufficiency.

*Pastor Van Gale, Sr.
Praise Fellowship Church
Carol Stream, Ill.*

SIGN OF THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A GOOD DEAL AND A CUT-RATE LOAN.

Church financing from Bank of the West comes with a wealth of experience and a bond of commitment that has served religious organizations for a decade and a half. No other bank has been as single-minded in its dedication to church lending. Churches are the only customers we serve in our Religious Organizations Lending department.

It's why we are the market leader among banks in religious lending. In the last 15 years, we've committed more than half a billion dollars to the religious community, nationwide.

We understand how to work with stewardship campaigns so you can keep construction moving without costly delays. We can help you with the intricacies of environmental law. We know what's realistic to expect in construction costs, schedules and quality, and how to ensure you get full value for your money. And we're experienced in church refinancings, land acquisition, renovation and expansion loans, as well as underwriting construction projects.

Lending to religious organizations isn't something new that we're "trying out." Unlike some banks, we haven't jumped in and out of church lending as the economy changed. We don't think of this as something to sandwich in between loans to multinational conglomerates, high-flying technology companies or foreign governments. We think of it as our mission.

Because we're a full service bank, we can do more for you — leases or loans for sound systems, church furnishings, computers, vehicles, and more. And our service extends to cash management, deposit services and investments. We can introduce you to recognized professionals who specialize in working with churches in the fields of construction and stewardship development.

We made our commitment to support churches, their schools and ministries a decade and a half ago. We've been fulfilling it every day since, with dedicated professionals whose sole mission is to deliver financial services to the religious community.

So, if you really want the best team for a successful outcome for your project, look beyond short term rate-cutters. Look to building a relationship with a financial partner that knows how to help, and is committed to doing so, long-term.

That's what you'll get with Bank of the West. Give us a call at 1-800-405-2327.

And get a good deal more for your money.

☐ Telling a Christian with severe depression to "snap out of it" through prayer, Bible reading, or repentance is like telling a Christian with cancer to "get over it." Because we live in a fallen world, people do get emotional problems in the same way they get cancer or heart disease. I agree with MacArthur that our sufficiency is in Christ. Yet as a faithful Wesleyan, I would have to say that our Great Physician is channeled through some "extraordinary means"—that is, a well-grounded therapist and medication. People are channels of grace, and medication can be too if God so chooses.

Carlson has written a fine article. He left out an important piece: the role of the demonic. The Gospels show it, Luke 8 or Mark 5, and there are emotional and psychological overlaps in the passages. The first three centuries of the Christian church affirm the same, as does contemporary experience.

Truth Worse Than Our Fears

☐ L. Gregory Jones has given us a marvelous look at the possibilities of forgiveness in the Christian arena ["How Much Truth Can We Take?" Feb. 9]. I lived in South Africa from 1972-77 and 1985-93. I preached love and forgiveness. I taught Bible college students from every tribe. I saw the anger, fear, hatred, and horrors of apartheid up close and personal. I wept with my black colleagues and often argued with my white friends. I'm certain I could have and should have done much more. For the sake of a work visa I sometimes remained silent. Please forgive me.

I've been in and out of South Africa during the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's work. The truth is actually worse than our worst fears. That forgiveness from victims is being given is testimony to the cry for freedom that lives in every heart. The resistance to forgiveness in some is testimony that we are often bound by our sinful natures. That even one victim can forgive in South Africa's story of hate is proof that God's grace is still greater than all our sin.

THE CALVIN EXPERIENCE

'Truth is Essential'

There's a counterpoint to Henry Ford's oft-repeated maxim that history is, more or less, bunk. It flows from the pen of Miguel de Cervantes in Don Quixote. He regards history to be "a sacred kind of writing, because truth is essential to it, and where truth is, there God himself is..."

At Calvin College, accomplished historians open up the treasures and the truth of the past and present it as a gift to their students — in time for them to make some history of their own.

What makes a Calvin education so distinctive and life-shaping for thousands of questing students each year? The experience and excellence of Christ-centered professors who love to teach.

The Pensacola Revival

Casual readers of Steve Rabey's informative article on the Brownsville Revival may have mistakenly inferred that the Pensacola News Journal actually uncovered some financial irregularities occurring in the revival [News, Feb. 9]. Thankfully, no such irregularities have occurred and the impact and scope of the revival continues to increase, in spite of the charges raised by the Journal. (Those seeking a response to the most serious accusations can consult Brownsville's official Web site at brownsville-revival.org.) While we welcome constructive correction and reproof, we cannot be sidetracked by false allegations, and it remains our profound and sacred joy to give our attention instead to help wake up a slumbering church and touch a lost world.

Prophecy in Advertising

For the last two months you have carried a full-page announcement of "Israel's Jubilee" to be held April 29–May 3, 1998, in Orlando, Florida. The ad states: "In May of 1948, after almost 2000 years of wandering, the modern state of Israel was born. Jesus said the generation that sees this will not pass away before His return..."

Jesus did not say this, and the statement is not found in Scripture. It is amazing to see the amenability of religious teachers in assuming things are true when they are not.

Harry J. Bower
Asheville, N.C.

Jesus' statement about a generation that would "not pass away" can be found in Mark 13:30 and Matthew 24:34. Neither context mentions the re-establishment of the state of Israel, but instead focuses on the desecration of the temple and the intense persecution of God's people.

The Lesson of Karla Faye Tucker

Evangelical instincts against her execution were right, but not because she was a Christian.

When Timothy McVeigh was on trial for the Oklahoma City bombing, a Denver radio station set up a checkpoint where people could honk their horns if they thought McVeigh was guilty and ought to be executed. In just a few days, over 24,000 Coloradans honked their judgment that McVeigh should be "fried." The enormity of McVeigh's deed knocked many death-penalty fence sitters off the rail: If ever there was a case in which capital punishment is justified, they thought, this is it.

But then, on the heels of the McVeigh trial, the case of Karla Faye Tucker upset the usual alignments on capital punishment (see p. 19). A Texas woman who killed two people with a pickax, Tucker was later born again and then executed for her crimes. Rich Cizik, policy analyst for the National Association of Evangelicals, said, "It's no secret that evangelicals have been stalwarts behind the death penalty." But Tucker's execution, he said, produced a "moral revulsion" among evangelicals "because she is a woman of such obvious spiritual change." This change led Pat Robertson and other conservative leaders to plead her case. "Any justice system that is worthy of the name must have room for mercy," said Robertson. Executing Tucker "is more an act of vengeance than it is appropriate justice."

Some of the usual death-penalty opponents were skeptical, saying such leaders would not be able to hold to that position for long. "Conservative voters will start to ask," said Samuel Jordan of Amnesty International, "Well, if I think it's OK to commute the death sentence this time, is it just for women that we're doing this, or for male prisoners as well?"

But Pat Nolan, senior vice president of Prison Fellowship Ministries (PFM), predicted "a lot of conversations around the dinner table and hopefully in the pews. . . . I hope this will continue to be discussed and prayed about."

Conversation starter

As we continue this prayerful conversation, here are some things to consider:

The death penalty as it is practiced in this country is unfair and discriminatory. For those of us who support the death penalty as a moral abstraction, here are some troubling facts: On average, only one in a thousand murderers is executed. Race, class, and geography are the best predictors of who will get the death sentence for first-degree murder. If the victims are white and the perpetrators are poor minorities who commit their crimes in one of a handful of mostly southern states, their chances are greatest of receiving the death penalty. Nearly 90 percent of persons executed are convicted of killing whites, yet people of color are the victims of homicide in a majority of cases. Slightly over half of the executions since 1976 have been in Texas, Virginia, and Florida.

The legal resources available to poor people are woefully inadequate. The American Bar Association (ABA) cites examples of lawyers being assigned to murder cases who had just passed their bar exam or had no previous criminal trial experience, and instances where the defense attorney is paid only $800 per case with as little as $500 for expenses. "In case after case," an ABA report concludes, "decisions about who will die and who will live turn not on the nature of the offense the defendant is charged with committing, but rather on the nature of the legal representation the defendant receives." This unconscionable situation was exacerbated by get-tough-on-crime laws passed by Congress in 1996, which curtailed postconviction appeals and withdrew federal funding from organizations that support postconviction proceedings. Such uneven and inequitable application of death-penalty provisions prompted the ABA in February 1997 to call for suspension of the death penalty. And former Justice Lewis Powell, the author of the 1976 Supreme Court ruling reinstating the death penalty, has said he regrets his involvement in that decision more than anything else during his tenure on the Court.

Even worse than inadequate defense is the execution of the falsely convicted. According to a study entitled In Spirit of Innocence (1992), at least 23 innocent people have been executed in this century. And since 1972, 69 people wrongly convicted have been released from death row—21 of them since 1993. What has become of the principle that it is better that a few guilty people go free than that one person be falsely convicted?

The death penalty does not deter. Since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976, the number of executions and the death-row population have grown significantly. Yet the murder rate has remained essentially the same. In fact, a majority of the states that practice capital punishment have higher murder rates than those that don't. And the U.S. murder rate is anywhere from five to twenty times that of other industrialized nations without the death penalty.

The death penalty does not deter, because murder often happens in the heat of the moment. And those who premeditate murder are willing to take the risk they won't get caught.

Society needs to work at the conditions that breed violent crime. Police chiefs, in a 1995 Hart Research poll, ranked the death penalty dead last as an option for deterring violent crimes. Their preferred strategies included reducing drug abuse, providing jobs, simplifying court rules, lengthening prison sentences, and reducing availability of guns (in that order). They know from experience what scholars have learned from statistics: (1) that when crime statistics are controlled for employment, there is little difference between blacks and whites (economic justice is as important as retributive justice); (2) child abuse increases the chance of juvenile delinquency 40 times (we need to get to the would-be criminals before they toughen up).

The death penalty fails to console. Does the death penalty ease the suffering of a murder victim's survivors who suffer from their sense of loss, from self-blame, and (oddly enough) from the criminal justice system? Whereas biblical law treated crime as an offense against a victim, it is now treated more as an offense against the state. And instead of setting things right between offender and victim, our criminal justice system pits the state against the accused. Victims are often helpless observers of a process that does not address their needs at a time when they are most needy.

Indeed, the state can provide some, but not all, of what survivors of violent crime need: a sense of protection against the crime being repeated; places, times, and rituals for lamenting their loss; knowledge that a guilty party has been identified; and a sentence that shows the crime is taken seriously.

Vengeful feelings are natural, but vengeful acts are ultimately counterproductive as they retraumatize the survivor. Nevertheless, survivors should never be pressed to forgive too quickly. They need time and communal support to weave into the story of their lives this horrendous turn of events. Fortunately, organizations like Neighbors Who Care, a PFM subsidiary, have emerged and are turning this need into a ministry of the church. Christian compassion can comfort the afflicted. More executions cannot.

Rebuking the spirit of vendetta

As evangelicals engage in dialogue about the death penalty, we should keep in mind two parallel streams of biblical thought about crime and punishment: One of them focuses on justice, the other on ending violence, while both of them are designed to break the cycle of vengeance.

The justice-oriented stream of thought emphasizes limiting vengeance. There, for example, we hear Moses utter the famous "eye for an eye, tooth for a tooth"—a law designed to limit reprisals by keeping them proportional.

Human nature inevitably escalates the measure of our retaliation above our loss in order to show who is boss. As Lamech boasted: "I have slain a man for wounding me, a young man for striking me" (Gen. 4:23). But the law of God always seeks to limit punishment to the proper proportion and the proper agent. Thus Paul recognized a legitimate role for the admittedly oppressive Roman government (Rom. 13:1-5): the magistrate bears the sword as a terror to evildoers.

The law of Moses put the brakes on vengeance, but the other stream of biblical thought calls for its end. God's first, and perhaps most characteristic, response to murder was not law but grace: he placed a protective mark on Cain, protecting him from those who would avenge Abel's blood, and warning others of a dangerous man.

In Leviticus, the Lord commanded: "You shall not take vengeance or bear any grudge against the sons of your own people." Here the Old Testament anticipated Jesus' teaching: "You have heard it said, 'An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.' But I say to you, Do not resist one who is evil. But if any one strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also." Paul likewise proclaimed that vengeance is reserved for God and that Christians should feed their enemies, overcoming evil with good (Rom. 12:19-21).

Jesus' counsel of nonresistance has as its goal not only crushing the spirit of vendetta, but also reconciliation (a goal embodied in victim-offender reconciliation programs that have proved effective where tried).

Jesus' teaching of nonresistance is difficult to live out on a societal level. Not all evangelicals (indeed, not all evangelicals who edit CHRISTIANITY TODAY) agree on how to apply Jesus' teaching of nonresistance to public policy. But it seems clear that the gospel demands that in ministry, Christians work more for reconciliation than for retribution, and that in public life we work against the spirit of revenge so cruelly displayed by the crowds outside many sites of execution.

When the death penalty becomes a political football, partisan rhetoric tends to stress justice—a code word for payback—and appeal to our carnal appetite for revenge. Whatever public policy we deem wisest, we must resist that kind of rhetoric. For while murderers clearly deserve to lose their lives, Christians know that we all deserve death, and the ethic of Jesus drives us to spend most of our limited energies in the relationally complex and costly task of reconciliation.

Jesus' own life and death show the cost of a ministry of reconciliation. His sacrifice was not only an act of justice, a substitute for the all penalties richly deserved by the sinful world God so loved, but was also an act of reconciliation, absorbing in himself the shock of all the world's vengeance.

However we learn to apply these biblical themes of reconciliation and the abhorrence of vengeance in the public sphere, it seems clear that the death penalty has outlived its usefulness. It has not made the United States a safer country or a more equitable one. The potential of life imprisonment without parole and other protective measures, however, offer better options for the state, which must continue to deal with 20,000 murders each year.

FINANCIAL CRISIS

Promise Keepers Staff Lose Jobs

Promise Keepers (PK) on February 18 told its 345 full-time staffers they would no longer be paid after March 31, the result of a financial crisis precipitated by the move from a fee-based income for men's meetings to donor contributions.

However, the 19 PK conferences planned for this year remain scheduled. Last fall, the PK board of directors unanimously supported founder Bill McCartney's call for removing the $60 admission fee for stadium events. The fees had provided 72 percent of the organization's income.

McCartney issued a challenge on February 19 for churches to support the ministry. "Now, as the fees to all events are removed, it is time for churches to assist us in our mission to men."

Refuting a Detroit Free Press report, McCartney told CT that he did not say "it was the will of God" for every church in the country to donate $1,000 to PK. "I do believe the churches need to recognize that God's hand is on this ministry," McCartney told CT. "We're calling the churches to join together. Wherever that happens, God moves." McCartney told CT the news does not sound the death knell for PK. Donations covered the entire $9 million cost of last October's Stand in the Gap gathering in Washington, D.C. (CT, Nov. 17, 1997, p. 62).

Since January, seven regional pastors' conferences have brought in $1 million in pledges from more than 1,000 churches. On average, it costs $1 million to stage one PK stadium event, according to public affairs director Stephen Ruppe. He says PK expected a higher amount in donations to be sent. Ruppe says PK has not filed for bankruptcy. The organization owns its Denver office headquarters, has no outstanding loans, and "is on a normal business cycle with vendors."

PK will restaff as the ministry's income from donations increases, according to Ruppe. A few paid staff have agreed to work as volunteers for an unspecified amount of time.

Bombshell: McCartney told staffers, "I have a broken heart."

Among those rallying to support PK is Campus Crusade for Christ founder Bill Bright, who says he has sent letters to thousands of pastors and laymen asking them to "help our brothers in need" in PK.

"There's been a lot of support for PK," says Paul Nelson, president of the Evangelical Council for Financial Accountability. "The news of this change will bring out supporters."

PK cut its budget and staff by 20 percent last summer (CT, Sept. 1, 1997, p. 90). In November, McCartney pledged there would be no further reductions. He said at the time, "If one can't get paid, then no one will be paid." □

Series Examines Christian Origins

The PBS documentary series Frontline turns its attention to the historical roots of the Christian faith in its lengthy and lavishly produced two-part program "From Jesus to Christ: The First Christians," airing nationwide April 6-7.

Three years in the making, the four-hour documentary brings ancient history to life through its stunning cinematography and creative use of visual materials and texts.

While the series does an excellent job putting Jesus and the early church in historical and social contexts, it does not suggest that Jesus or the faith he founded is in any way supernatural or divine.

New Testament scholar Craig Blomberg of Denver Seminary says the program "does not acknowledge distinctively evangelical perspectives at any point."

Scholars from Yale, Harvard, Duke, Brown, DePaul, Princeton, and Boston universities served as consultants. The Arthur Vining Davis Foundation helped finance the show.

YOUTH OUTREACH

Cruz Launches Anti-Gang Campaign

Former gang leader Nicky Cruz kicks off a 15-city U.S. tour this month to deliver his testimony of redemption to a new generation.

Dubbed TRUCE—To Reach Urban Children Everywhere—it incorporates television, inner-city multimedia drama, and the rerelease of Cruz's 1968 book Run Baby Run, now in 43 languages.

Born to Puerto Rican parents who practiced voodoo, Cruz fled to Brooklyn, New York, where, as a 16-year-old gang leader, he led followers in beatings, robberies, terrorism, and killings. Then, 40 years ago, street preacher David Wilkerson led him to Christ. Wilkerson's The Cross and the Switchblade, a bestselling book and 1971 motion picture, brought Cruz's story to an earlier generation.

Cruz has spent the intervening years talking to youth in stadiums and churches around the globe. At age 59, Cruz, whose ministry is now based in Colorado Springs, holds "invasions" in violence-plagued neighborhoods, inviting gang members to his rallies where he challenges them to turn from violence to Christ.

Cruz has no formal working relationships with other inner-city Christian ministries to gangs. Eugene Rivers of the National Ten-Point Leadership Foundation supports the work of Cruz but says it would be more effective by including more black leaders in reaching out to gangs.

Reaching youth: Cruz holds a gun surrendered at an altar call.

Still, Cruz says he is reaching a lost generation. "I can smell the guts of the ghetto," he told CT. "These kids are young, hardened criminals who don't respond to parents, teachers, or the jail system," he says. "They receive a glorified message of gang activity every day in rap music, television, and films. They will respond to a message about God if it comes from others who have survived the same living hell."

EXECUTION IS NOT THE SOLUTION

Execution protest: Betty Dunn prays outside Huntsville state prison in Texas.

Conservatives Rethink Death Penalty

Karla Faye Tucker had the support of the familiar religious opponents of the death penalty as her lawyers sought to stop her execution by lethal injection.

Pope John Paul II made a plea for clemency to Texas Gov. George W. Bush for the woman who 15 years ago used a pickax to hack two people of vengeance than it is appropriate justice."

On a three-day drug and alcohol binge, Tucker and her male companion—who died in prison of liver disease in 1993—entered a Houston apartment intending to steal motorcycle parts. The murders resulted instead.

Tucker, 38, became a Christian soon after being imprisoned 14 years ago. On death row she became a bold witness for the Lord. In television interviews, the articulate, attractive, affable, born-again Christian came across as a gentle-spirited woman who had been both transformed and rehabilitated.

Yet, Bush let the execution proceed in Huntsville on February 3. It marked the first execution of a woman in Texas since 1863, and the first anywhere in the nation since 1984. Capital-punishment foes reasoned that if a state put to death someone as personable as Tucker, a psychological barrier against executing women had been broken.

Not all conservatives opposed the execution. Columnist Cal Thomas warned that an exception for Tucker would lead to a spate of jailhouse conversions. "To allow people convicted of past acts to be absolved by future acts would ruin what is left of the criminal-justice system," Thomas wrote. "Would Pat Robertson favor commuting her sentence if she had converted to some other faith?" [CT] to death. National Council of Churches national secretary Joan Campbell Brown, Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) president Richard Hamm, and United Church of Christ president Paul Sherry also sent a joint letter.

But several conservative Christians who have vigorously defended the death penalty in the past—including Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell—questioned the wisdom of executing Tucker, who became a Christian while in prison.

"She is not the same person who committed those heinous ax murders," said Robertson, who led a crusade for mercy on The 700 Club. "She is totally transformed, and I think to execute her is more of an act

REFERENDUM

Maine Repeals Homosexual Rights Law

Backed by the success of a get-out-the-vote effort to defeat a homosexual-rights law in Maine, a rejuvenated Christian Coalition is eyeing new links with churches around the country.

By a 51 percent to 49 percent margin, Maine on February 10 became the first state to repeal a homosexual-rights law, which had been passed by the state legislature last year to ban discrimination in employment, housing, and public accommodation. Christian Coalition maintained that the law provided "special rights."

The group helped distribute 240,000 voter guides in churches and mail another 100,000 postcards to registered voters. In the process, the Chesapeake, Virginia-based organization added 77,000 households to its mailing list.

The coalition then announced plans to recruit 100,000 "church liaisons" to help oppose forces such as gambling and pornography. [CT]

◆ Operation Rescue National director Flip Benham began serving a six-month jail sentence February 18 after being convicted of trespassing at E. C. Glass High School in Lynchburg, Virginia. On November 10, Benham led 150 Liberty University students in distributing anti-abortion literature and Christian tracts. Benham refused to leave after police informed him the demonstration posed a threat to public safety.

◆ An Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA) disciplinary committee stripped the clergy credentials of Ames, Iowa, pastor Steve Sabin on February 3 after an ecclesiastical trial. The panel determined that Sabin, 38, can no longer lead Lord of Life Lutheran Church, because he is engaged in homosexual activity. ELCA rules allow homosexual clergy to be ordained only if they take a vow of celibacy. Sabin has been pastor of the 150-member congregation since 1985. He and his wife divorced in 1990, and he now lives with a man he met via the Internet. Sabin appealed the ELCA decision on March 4.

Restrictions on Religion Get Uneven Enforcement

Recent legislation that limited religious practice in Russia may not be fully enforced because of unresolved constitutional issues. But some local Russian leaders, citing provisions in the new measure, have sought to inhibit minority religious groups.

Official guidelines sent throughout Russia recommend a soft approach in dealing with religious organizations. Some of the clauses of the official advisory stand in sharp contrast to the controversial law passed last fall (CT, Nov. 17, 1997, p. 66).

In the meantime, however, the new law provides a ready means for discrimination against minority religious groups, including most Christian groups that are not Russian Orthodox. According to World Churches Handbook, there are about 23 million Russian Orthodox believers among Russia's 147 million people. However, research by Anatoly Rudenko, head of the Russian Bible Society, projects that at best there are 3.3 million practicing Christians, including Orthodox, Catholics, and Protestants.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFLICT: The temporary guidelines openly state that the new law contradicts the Russian Constitution by taking away citizens' rights. The new law requires annual re-enrollment of already registered religious entities that have existed in Russia fewer than 15 years. Specifying a time frame violates the federal constitution, which bans retroactive legislation. During the 15-year period, new religious groups operate with limited rights. The temporary guidelines suggest that for reregistration a religious group need only inform local authorities of its intent to continue. But they fail to protect underground churches, most of which have existed for more than 15 years but were never registered during the repressive Soviet era.

It is unclear if the final guidelines on the religion law will reflect the perspective of the temporary guidelines. So far, officials call the temporary guidelines an "internal document" without legal standing.

Also, the law does not provide for legal re-establishment of congregations disbanded by the Soviets following the 1917 Bolshevik revolution.

RESTRICTIONS IMPLEMENTED: Some Russian officials have taken advantage of the ambiguity, demanding that certain religious groups be shut down.

For example, in Jaroslavl, about 150 miles northeast of Moscow, local authorities have repeatedly threatened to close the Christian Center of the New Generation, a Pentecostal group, even though it build. Other tactics include charging exorbitant permit fees and demanding bribes.

In the past, Moscow itself has been fairly immune from abuses of religious freedom. But current events in the capital point to increased hardship.

Local policy toward religion became clearer after Moscow mayor Yuri Luzhkov in recent months issued a series of decrees. A strong contender for the next presidential election, Luzhkov openly supports a more powerful role for the Moscow patriarchate of the Russian Orthodox Church.

Luzhkov created a hierarchy of religious confessions. Russian Orthodoxy, Muslims, and Jews are considered "highly esteemed." Representatives from these groups make up an official council to decide all religious issues, placing minority groups at a distinct disadvantage. Luzhkov also gave the Moscow patriarchate preferential treatment by exempting it from paying taxes on any of its buildings and lands.

NEW WARNINGS: Western leaders and Russian activists have not abandoned efforts to ensure full religious freedom in Russia.

In January, a delegation of religious-freedom advocates arrived in Moscow for face-to-face meetings with Russian officials. According to U.S. Rep. Chris H. Smith (R-N.J.), the delegation made it clear that abuses of religious rights would damage financial and diplomatic relations between Russia and the West.

Soon after, a group of high-ranking Russian officials attended a Heritage Foundation event in Washington, D.C., where they repeated reassurances that they intended to use the regulatory process to avoid implementing unconstitutional provisions in the law.

But Anatoly Pchelintsev, director of the Institute of Religion and Law in Moscow, accuses Russian officials of "saying one thing in America and another in Russia." On Voice of America, Pchelintsev said, "I believe that if we don't defend freedom of religion now in Russia we will not have a democracy." Pchelintsev warned that once the regulations are implemented, there will be "massive violations of human rights and freedom of religion."

Established by ten people in 1991, New Generation today has 1,500 members and eight congregations.

In addition to threats, some municipal officials are finding other ways to put pressure on non-Russian Orthodox churches.

In the city of Klin, about 40 miles north of Moscow, evangelical Baptist church pastor Anatoly Sokolov says the government increased his church's annual tax bill threefold. Failure to pay taxes could result in confiscation of church property. According to Sokolov, Orthodox churches are required to pay only 40 percent of their assessed taxes.

Another common method of hindering ministries is to raise the rent beyond a church's ability to pay. Most non-Orthodox congregations meet in rented facilities because construction costs are prohibitive or they have been denied permission to

The Cornfield Revival

For two years, thousands have been jumping for joy.

Steve Gray reached a crisis point in his ministry in March 1996. Although Gray had built up the Smithton Community Church from 13 to 180 people in a dozen years, he wondered whether he had missed a calling higher than being a rural pastor in a community of 532 souls.

Bruised by squabbles within his central Missouri congregation, Gray regretted that lives had not been transformed as he had hoped. Broken and in despair, Gray drove 1,000 miles to Pensacola, Florida, to the Brownsville Assembly of God revival (CT, March 3, 1997, p. 53). But while in Brownsville, contemplating leaving the ministry, Gray says he heard God telling him that revival would come to his own church. "I thought that sounded ridiculous," Gray, 45, told CT. "I was in a shambles myself. How could a broken man have a revival?" He would soon find out.

Two weeks later, just as he returned from Pensacola to a Smithton Community Church Sunday evening service, Gray says he experienced the power of God as never before. He began twirling and jumping, both new sensations. The presence of the Lord spread contagiously throughout the congregation, and continuous praise lasted for 45 minutes. People openly confessed their sins and repented. Others, "slain in the Spirit," fell to the floor.

In the aftermath, Smithton's church members realized that a watershed event had occurred in the life of their non-denominational church. They agreed to meet nightly. Within three weeks, news of the revival spread, and outsiders began to flock to the revival meetings.

TRANSFORMED TOWN: Two years and hundreds of services later, the church continues to hold revival-oriented meetings five times a week: Wednesdays for corporate prayer, Thursdays for leadership training, and Fridays, Saturdays, and Sundays for services.

Pastoral team: Steve Gray preaches, plays keyboard, and composes worship songs; Kathy Gray sings and preaches.

The worship is marked by joyful shouting and high-octane praise choruses. Their jumping shakes the floor.

On average, about 300 visitors from throughout the United States and 250 members attend worship services, which routinely last three hours or more. Nearly all the members—from first graders to retirees—attend every service. Most have a job to do: leading worship, running the sound system, caring for infants, helping direct traffic, ushering, praying, interceding, and catching those who fall down.

Gray grew up in Sedalia, a city of 19,000, seven miles west of Smithton. He and his wife of 23 years, Kathy, spent seven years in a traveling music and evangelistic ministry before a few Smithton residents in 1984 convinced him to reopen the church that had closed four years earlier. The prospect of worshiping in a church sanctuary that smelled like dead mice did not make much sense, but Gray believed the Lord told him to restart the congregation.

HELPING HURTING PASTORS: In an unexpected way, the Smithton revival has given Gray that higher purpose he had been seeking. Gray has found himself becoming a pastor to pastors.

"Many people who come here are pastors who need to be ministered to, who need life to come back into their ministry," he says. "We want to try to help the devastated pastor." The church sometimes helps pay for airline tickets and motel rooms for bonafide pastors who want to visit but who do not have the money.

Near the end of each service, Smithton members pray specifically for pastors. "Hundreds of pastors have come and told me how terrible they've been treated by their congregations," he says. "This is a safe place for people to be restored."

Pastor Kent Kelso of the New Life Christian Church in Stillwater, Oklahoma, is one of Smithton's success stories. Kelso had struggled with many of the same problems that beset Gray, including internal church strife, depression, marital stress, and thoughts of leaving the ministry before he visited. Kelso says, "The sermons and prayers really touched my life. Steve and Kathy are good counselors." In the past year, Kelso's church has been touched by revival, and services are held there five nights a week.

MUSIC MINISTRY: The Smithton revival has stimulated intense spiritual growth in church members. Worship leader Eric Nuzum, 28, drove a forklift for a local factory before becoming associate pastor.

"I didn't want to give up my Friday and Saturday nights at first," Nuzum says. "But now the joy of the Lord sustains us."

Nuzum and Gray, who has a bachelor's degree in music education, write many of the praise choruses. The fervor has attracted the attention of Integrity Music creative director Don Moen, who visited in February and committed to making an on-site recording. "We want to go where revival is happening, even in unlikely remote places," Moen says. "As with other 'revival' churches, there is a real repentance." Moen notes that the recording of live music from the Pensacola revival was Hosanna! Music's third-biggest seller last year.

CHURCH AS HOME: The small-town environment helps keep people committed to the Lord and to each other.

"We're doing something eternal here," Gray preached at a February service. "The things people are living for are tempo-

In addition to changes in individual lives, Smithton no longer looks like a backwater country church. A huge sound board sits in a high-tech loft. Overheads are computer-generated. Worship leaders wear wireless microphone headsets. An elaborate light-tracking system illuminates the stage. For ten years Gray had no support staff, or even an office telephone. Now there are six full-time workers.

Gray has no plans for upgrading his lifestyle—changes that Brownsville leaders have found to be controversial (CT, Feb. 9, 1998, p. 81). He lives in the same house he did when he began preaching 14 years ago. And he has not sought a raise since revival began.

Whenever Gray is tempted to think of Smithton's accomplishments, there are town residents who remind him that they do not appreciate the attention, noise, and traffic that revival has brought. He expects services will continue only as long as needy people keep visiting. On the other hand, Gray is open to additional meetings. "The early church in Acts met every day," Gray says. "We're not doing that—yet."

rary. We don't have time to run out for the latest video."

Indeed, attendees are not watching the clock. Worship, preaching, and prayer each takes at least an hour at services.

Testimonies tell of transformed lives. Terese and Mark Richards of Aberdeen, South Dakota, explained how they had trekked to Smithton in November in a last-ditch effort to save their marriage. "God's building our house, and it won't fall again," a tearful Terese Richards told the crowd.

Kudakwashe Mushaniga wants to take some of the fire back to Zimbabwe after she graduates from the University of Kansas at Lawrence. Every weekend she drives 110 miles to attend services.

Nola Lampe moved to the area from Centralia 85 miles away just to be near the church. She had suffered with fibromyalgia for seven years until a healing during the praise time a year ago. "I was in a wheelchair and I couldn't sleep from fatigue and pain," she says. "Now I can do all the things I used to do. It's been the best year of my life."

Jordan Emerges As New Hub for Training Pastors

Evangelical school teaches Mideast students.

Imad Shehadeh labored for five years to open a seminary in his adopted homeland of Jordan. As he earned his degree in 1990 from Dallas Theological Seminary, the soft-spoken Shehadeh dreamed of opening a graduate school in Amman, the Jordanian capital, to serve as a base for Christians in a region that is more than 90 percent Muslim.

When he returned to Jordan, few endorsed his vision. Authorities in the Muslim country twice shut down Shehadeh for training without government approval. And many Christian leaders found his original doctrinal statement too restrictive.

But things began to change as Jordan's government worked through democratic reforms that liberalized the country.

Realizing he needed to have the government's support, Shehadeh applied again for permission to open a school. The government's Ministry of Culture not only granted approval for the school to open, but also wrote into the school's constitution an article allowing interfaith dialogue with Muslims.

STRATEGIC LOCATION: Today, Jordan Evangelical Theological Seminary (JETS) is in its third year of legal operation. The evangelical school has unprecedented freedoms in a Muslim country. In some Arabic-speaking countries, Muslims who convert to Christianity are in danger of losing their jobs, families, or lives.

By embracing a broad doctrinal statement, the 43-year-old Shehadeh, a refugee, has gained the support of numerous churches. Jordanian leaders from the country's five main denominations are on the seminary board.

Already the school has 28 resident and visiting faculty—half of them from Jordan. Nearly 150 students from nine Arabic-speaking countries—Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Yemen, Morocco, Algeria, Egypt, and Sudan—have been accepted to study at the school.

The interdenominational school offers undergraduate and graduate-level training. JETS does not have the governmental or access restrictions of other Christian schools in the Mideast.

Shehadeh says the Middle East

1994 have all been of strategic importance for JETS.

Nowhere is that seen more clearly than in the life of its students. For example, Rumail Yousef, an Iraqi electrician by trade, remained in Iraq while thousands of his countrymen fled after the Gulf War when United Nations sanctions began to cripple the country's economy. In the midst of economic woes, Baghdad's main evangelical church began to grow. From a core of 25 saints, the church now boasts attendance of 800 on Sundays.

Burgeoning growth meant a greater need for trained leadership, so in 1993 the church sent Rumail away to study theology before returning to help pastor the flock. But his visa to Egypt, where he had applied to study in the Presbyterian seminary in Cairo, never came. After a year's wait, he applied to study at the Baptist seminary in Lebanon, but authorities in that country also turned him away. So Rumail applied for admission in the bachelor's program at JETS. He saw no other alternative.

Training ground: Jordan Evangelical Theological Seminary meets in leased facilities and could use more room, but there is a good teacher-student ratio.

KIRK ALBRECHT PHOTOS

is experiencing unprecedented growth in the number of evangelicals. Yet there are not enough leaders to follow up new believers. Often churches are small, and local leadership has little theological training. But JETS is training 45 Iraqi students to return to a country with only a handful of seminary-trained pastors. JETS students are eager learners. Last year, students started three dozen home groups in an effort to gain experience in church planting.

REACHING INDIVIDUALS: Jordan's freedoms, its central location in the Middle East, and its peace with Israel since

"JETS can give me the best training I could get for ministry here in the Middle East, so God opened this door for me," says Rumail, who is being encouraged by professors to stay and finish a master's degree before returning to Baghdad.

Rumail is not alone. Behind impoverished Iraq, the second-highest percentage of JETS students come from war-torn Sudan. For these students, study in Beirut or Cairo is difficult because of political tensions. The hope is that most will return to minister in their own cultures. Because Jordan has friendly relations with both Sudan and Iraq, students can more easily come for training. JETS's reputation with Jordan's security forces means that students can obtain coveted student residence visas.

EXTENSION PROGRAMS:

The idea of an evangelical seminary in the Muslim-dominated Middle East may seem incongruous. Yet, there are at least 15 evangelical theological education institutes in the region, including seminaries, Bible schools, and extension learning programs.

Jordan is assuming a leadership role. Since 1981, the Program for Theological Education by Extension (PTEE) in Amman has trained more than 1,000 Christians in Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, Egypt, and Iraq in Bible and theology. Through local churches, PTEE fills a crucial role in reaching potential leaders who cannot study in an institution due to location or cost.

"The issue isn't competition with schools like JETS," says PTEE executive director Richard Hart. "The issue is access. Our courses can help Christians identify gifts in ministry calling, which can lead to further training." PTEE is also less expensive: a class costs $2, while one course at JETS is 20 times as much.

JETS and PTEE are founding members of a new group called Middle East Association for Theological Education. MEATE is trying to help its members share experiences with one another and the international community. "We're aware of what is happening internationally," says Hart. "Arab theological education can stand on its own—it has something to say to the West."

Jordan's openness has come under King Hussein, who has been in power since 1952. His younger brother—and designated successor—Prince Hassan has pushed Muslim-Christian relations to a new level with the opening of the Royal Institute for Inter-Faith Studies. The institute has established a working relationship with JETS, and Shehadeh has contributed an article to their journal on the topic "Do Muslims and Christians have the same God?"

CHALLENGES REMAIN: Limited space and finances are a problem for JETS. "We could easily accept a lot more students if we had the space, the faculty, and administrators," Shehadeh says. Last summer, JETS had 130 applicants; only 11 could be admitted because of limited capacity.

JETS is meeting in rented quarters and needs $2.5 million to buy land and build new facilities. In February, the Indianapolis-based Overseas Council (OC) announced a $95,000 gift to JETS.

"When the door opened in Russia we were ready," says OC U.S. board chair Norm Miller. "We ought to be thinking about the same type of response in the Middle East."

JETS is young and faces many challenges. While the local church is encouraging, Arab believers have been unable to assume much financial support. Graduates will soon outnumber pastoral opportunities. Still, with an unreached population in the region of 200 million, the need for what JETS can help fill is waiting to be met.

"The home of the early church is the most needy mission field today," Shehadeh says. "We want to see a strong, vibrant church across the Middle East."

CHINA

Religion Leaders Cautious After Talks

Following a three-week tour of China, an American delegation of religious leaders, including Don Argue of the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE), is hopeful but cautious about religious freedom for Chinese believers.

"The church is growing tremendously in China and the last thing it wants is to be politicized," Argue said at a March press conference. "We had multiple contacts with the unregistered church. They are not afraid."

Chinese Christians who stray outside officially permitted religious activity continue to face the prospect of detention, arrest, and confiscation of property. But the situation for house-church leaders remains fluid, subject to unexpected twists and turns. In February, Gao Feng, one of the most prominent of China's younger generation of house-church leaders, was reported released from a labor camp, a few months before his two-and-a-half-year sentence was due to be completed.

The February visit by the American delegation of NAE's Argue, Rabbi Arthur Schneier of New York, and Archbishop Theodore McCarrick of Newark, New Jersey, took place while Congress debated legislation to sanction nations that permit religious persecution. During meetings in China, the Americans presented government officials with a list of 30 Christians and Buddhists who reportedly were being detained for their religious activities. In addition, Argue gave a Chinese-language Bible to Jiang Zemin, China's top leader, who told Argue that 50 years ago he had received medical care from the hands of an American Christian missionary.

The group traveled countrywide and stopped for visits in Tibet and Hong Kong, now under China's rule. An official report from the delegation is pending.

Not all religious-freedom advocates were in favor of the trip. Nina Shea of Freedom House said in a letter, "I fear that the delegation is touring a religious Potemkin Village, affording Beijing with a propaganda triumph [and] triggering further oppression against Chinese underground religious believers."

Argue told CT, "Our discussions [in China] were very frank and very pointed. This was the beginning of dialogue. We spent a lot of time building relations."

THEOLOGY

Leaders Aim to Heal Ancient Schism

Leaders from the Oriental Orthodox and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (WARC) are crafting a joint statement in order to heal the schism over Christ's natures that occurred after the Council of Chalcedon (451).

The split occurred after disputes over the relationship between the human and divine natures in Jesus Christ. At Chalcedon, theologians from Antioch and Alexandria were engaged in a dispute over Christ; the council adopted a compromise statement offered by Pope Leo, professing that Christ was one person with two natures, human and divine. But the Oriental Orthodox churches believed that Christ was one nature out of two. The ensuing disagreement led the Oriental Orthodox churches—which are not part of Eastern Orthodoxy—to pull away. While not a direct line, WARC considers itself inheritors of a line of theology from Chalcedon. There are five Oriental Orthodox churches, including Coptic, Syrian, Armenian, Ethiopian, and India's Malankara.

Two years from now, the agreement between Oriental Orthodox and Reformed leaders is expected to be approved at their sixth and final meeting in Scotland.

Both groups agree on these essentials: Christ was both fully divine and fully human, and the Incarnation was fully real. A 1999 meeting, scheduled to occur in Syria, will review issues concerning ministry and the sacraments.

WARC delegate Rebecca Harden Weaver, professor at Union Theological Seminary in Richmond, Virginia, says the Christology accord indicates disputes may still be bridged. "Much of the disagreement then was due to cultural differences, language differences, and ecclesiastical politics," she says. "We've discovered that the split between us that has remained for 1,500 years is unnecessary."

Bishop Vicken Aykasian of the Armenian Apostolic Church says, "We've almost come to the conclusion that there are very few problems between us, and we hope to solve those." Weaver says, "We are getting to know [the Oriental Orthodox] and their ministry apart from the Western traditions of either Catholicism or Protestantism."

Oriental Orthodox leaders have also been in ongoing dialogue with Roman Catholics and Eastern Orthodox.

'Christian Megaparty' Draws 120,000

Evangelists in Germany used modern music, dance, and drama in Europe's first satellite "Christian megaparty," which drew 120,000 young people to 430 venues across Germany and parts of German-speaking Austria, Poland, Croatia, Luxembourg, and Italy.

With a satellite feed from Nuremberg, the nondenominational "Jesus House" event featured music of the British dancefloor group World Wide Message Tribe and reggae-pop sounds of Caribbean singer Judy Bailey.

"Originally we had hoped for 50 venues all over the country," youth evangelist Roland Werner told CT. "The fact that it became more than 430 really surprised us."

According to Werner, more than 2,000 young people turned in response cards indicating conversion or rededication to Christ.

Christian young adults invited friends to venues at churches, swimming pools, discos, shops, and movie theaters. Local youth groups organized music and interviews prior to the start of 90-minute transmissions January 30 and 31.

Jesus House cost $140,000, mostly to cover satellite and technical crew fees. More than 1,400 Christian groups took part in the event, broadcast live over Christian radio and the Internet.

"Such evangelical youth programs offer a great setting to bring friends, who can see for themselves that being a Christian is not boring," says Ditmar Pauck, a Free Evangelical youth pastor who coordinated a satellite reception venue in Bonn.

Lively music and dance served a purpose in Jesus House, asserts Pauck, a drummer. "You have to be direct with youth in terms of their language and culture," he says. "You have to create a setting and work in the message."

About 3 percent of Germany's 82 million people are evangelical Christians.

ARCHAEOLOGY

Temple Mount on Shaky Ground?

The Temple Mount in Jerusalem, site of Jewish temples in biblical times and the Dome of the Rock and the Al Aqsa mosque today, may be in danger of collapse.

Archaeologist Shimon Gibson of the London-based Palestine Exploration Fund says the network of 49 cisterns under the 11-acre platform has been neglected for decades and may be responsible for cracks that have appeared in walls of the compound.

Gibson believes water may be settling into cracks and deteriorating the limestone. However, his concerns are not shared by most archaeologists or Muslim authorities. Gibson believes a collapse might occur during the Muslim season of Ramadan, when the Haram al Sharif, as it is known to Muslims, is filled with thousands of worshippers every Friday.

Zionists have long awaited the destruction of the Muslim Dome of the Rock, which they believe might foreshadow rebuilding the temple.

Thomas Ice, executive director of the Pre-Trib Research Center in Washington, D.C., and coauthor of the new book Fast Facts on Bible Prophecy (Harvest House), says reconstruction of the temple is "politically impossible" today. "But it was politically impossible for the Jews to return to their land, and it happened."

Educators Move Beyond Civil Rights to Reconciliation

Racial minorities in America have fought hard to win civil rights, yet the goal of racial reconciliation still seems far off, say Christian leaders.

Chris Rice, president of Reconcilers Fellowship, says on-campus Christians find themselves dealing not as intensively with the familiar issues of the civil-rights struggle, such as voting rights, housing, and employment, but rather with multiculturalism, an academic perspective that is often at odds with orthodox Christianity.

Rice says Christians need to think beyond the past methods of social ministry and seek "new concepts and paradigms." He says, "My hope is that we will see a weaving together of reconciliation-minded leaders on the college campus who will commit to each other to making racial healing and justice a major focus of their campuses over the next 20 years."

For three days in January, nearly 300 campus leaders from 50 schools gathered to plant seeds for new models of student ministry and reconciliation at a Reconcilers Fellowship meeting in Jackson, Mississippi. Their goal was to make an "honest search for answers."

"The conference was a major source of encouragement and help," says Samuel Barkat, vice president for multiethnic ministry at InterVarsity Christian Fellowship. "Instead of producing guilt, the conference stressed hope and possibilities." Barkat says participants were urged to think biblically about ethnic reconciliation and to embark on a reconciliation journey.

The event became all the more poignant when national reconciliation leader Spencer Perkins collapsed of a diabetic seizure. He recovered in time to deliver the event's closing address, only to die suddenly after heart failure three days later (CT, March 2, 1998, p. 73).

Lisa Sung, InterVarsity regional theological coordinator, says, "Spencer's life was extended before our eyes so that we absolutely could not miss this wake-up call."

Andy Crouch, campus minister with InterVarsity at Harvard University, says talks by Rice and Perkins instilled in him how far most ministries have to go in incorporating racial healing and justice.

"I came away from the conference dreaming of the day when InterVarsity will not have 'directors of black, Asian, and Hispanic student ministries,'" Crouch told CT. "We will be so thoroughly multicultural; that whites will not be seen as normal and others exceptional. Instead, we'll all be partners together."

The Coalition for Christian Colleges and Universities, InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, the National Black Evangelical Association, and two local colleges—the predominantly white Belhaven College and predominantly black Tougaloo College—cosponsored the conference.

CHRISTIANITY TODAY

WENDY MURRAY ZORA

Last year my son Jon had to wrestle two weight classes beyond his actual weight. Still, he won more matches than he lost, but when he took to the mat during one particular match, my heart sank. PeeWee Herman versus the Incredible Hulk came to mind. The buzzer sounded, and my son's opponent quickly flattened him. Yet somehow, before the interminable minute expired, Jon gathered his strength, wrestled himself from his opponent's grip, and stood up.

The second period looked like the first, with the added dimension of my son having swollen eye sockets and mat burns. He flailed under the weight of his antagonist, squirming as his dwindling strength allowed, until he dislodged his foe's grip, grunted and heaved, and stood up again.

By round three the other guy looked as dazed as Jon did as they lumbered to the starting position for the third time. My son was flattened yet again, and I wouldn't have blamed him for giving up. But seizing a second wind, Jon wiggled out of the near-pin and, unbelievably, stood up again. Then, as quickly as he had been felled earlier, he flipped his opponent and had him flat on the mat. The crowd exploded, hoping for the upset pin, but the buzzer rang. The referee lifted the arm of my son's opponent, but everyone there recognized that something greater than a victory for one and a loss for another had transpired on that mat.

My son's match kept coming to mind as I read Alister McGrath's recently published J. I. Packer: A Biography (Baker). In the author's meticulous documentation of James Innell Packer's role in the shaping of contemporary evangelicalism, I saw how tall this solitary man from Britain really stands, given how many times he was leveled, sometimes brutally, but kept standing up.

McGrath well positions Packer in British and North American church history, providing the blow-by-blow scenario of Packer's academic ascendance. Whether it is Packer's discovery of the contemporary relevance of the Puritans, or his decision to seek ordination in the Church of England, or his forging two key Christian think tanks in Britain, or his role as the "reforming principal" at Tyndale Hall in Bristol and his efforts at encouraging a renaissance in evangelical scholarship, or his emigration to Canada to teach at Regent College—by the end of the book the reader will apprehend the significance of this great man's contribution to the contemporary evangelical world.

KNOWING PACKER

The lonely journey of a passionate Puritan.

CKER

McGrath helps us appreciate his extraordinary mind and tenacity but only hints at the man behind the mind. In J. I. Packer a razor sharp intellect, a passionate heart, and devoted soul come together in startling unity.

Once when I announced to my sons that "Dr. Packer" would be joining us for dinner, one responded, "He's the one with the dent in his head, right?" They didn't think of him as the author of Knowing God or the one who has written more books than some people read in a lifetime. They remember the dent, freely showcased by Packer himself at our dinner table during a meal we had shared earlier. My boys sat riveted as he told the tale of his being chased at age seven, out of the schoolyard into the street, making—as he says it—"a violent collision with a truck, a bread van," adding, "I lost a bit of my head as a result."

J. I. Packer is a force, which McGrath adeptly captures in his book, but he is also a "pious Puritan" (as one friend calls him), a praying Christian, a pastor/teacher, husband and father, and to many, a friend. McGrath's narrative enables us to appreciate his unique place in contemporary evangelicalism, to which I add here my own understanding of the "man behind the mind."

Finding truth

It seemed as if the odds were against him from the get-go. Packer's modest upbringing in a working-class family living in a rented house did not polish him for the intellectual circles he would eventually inhabit. His father held a job at the Great Western Railway, which tendered "security but no money." Beyond that, his father, according to Packer, had been somewhat "unfitted for major responsibility"—which kept his career track with the railway in the realm of the "trivial"—"dealing with complaints about lost luggage" and the like. He had a mental collapse at the age of 52 when his responsibilities increased during the war. This meant that, at times, he could be a remote and bewildering presence in the home, though he recovered and became as "cheerful as before."

Being nearly killed by the truck introduced a new set of battles for the bookish boy from Gloucestershire. "From then on until I went to university," he recalls, "I used to move around wearing on my head an aluminum plate with a rubber pad attached around the edge. It made me more of a speckled bird than I was before."

He didn't like being a "speckled bird." He wanted to be a "star cricketer." But the dent and the metal plate dashed those aspirations. So he set his hopes on the less sublime, anticipating that, for his eleventh birthday, he would receive what British boys typically received on eleventh birthdays—a new bike.

His parents gave him a typewriter.

That set his course and, to some extent, his temperament. His "eggheaded" (his term) temperament coupled with the crushed head, the metal plate, and subsequent dashed hopes, left him lonely and melancholy and displeased with his "curious features" ("I don't know anyone who has a face like mine," he says). He became the easy target for the schoolyard bullies—"if they wanted someone to bully, it was very often me." He was always willing to lend homework help when needed though, even to the bullies: "If they wanted somebody to help them with their homework, again, it was very often me." He always felt on "the edge of things." "There was a solitariness about my young years," he recalls.

His surprise at the typewriter instead of the bike soon "gave way to delight," McGrath notes, as he hunted-and-pecked himself into a new and satisfying world of storywriting. This summoned and sharpened his linear thinking patterns and analytical skills, which, he says, are God-given: "God gave me a mind that always looks for the logical structure of what's being said."

But there is a downside to this kind of brilliance: "You get some shocks when you do that."

One such "shock" occurred during the frequent chess matches he shared with the son of a Unitarian minister. Between games, his opponent tried to sell Packer the "Unitarian bill of goods." But the presentation of Unitarian beliefs did not hold together for the linear, logical Packer, then age 15.

"Unitarianism affirms the ethic of Jesus as the most wonderful thing since ice cream and negates the divinity of Jesus as superstition," he says. "It seemed clear to me to ask—even when I didn't know much about the contents of the Bible—if these chaps believe so much of the New Testament, why don't they believe more? If they deny something so central as the divinity of Jesus, which is clearly there, why don't they believe less? How does this position hold together?" "Not by logic," he concluded, "but by willpower."

This realization had the unexpected result of forcing him to think seriously about the Christian faith. He had grown up a churchgoer, a "habit" instilled by his parents. But many Anglicans, as he knew them in his day, "didn't know what they believed and didn't think it mattered," he says. So he had never given any thought to "questions of truth" about the Christian faith—that is, until the Unitarian evangelist prompted his thinking. "My mind had been grabbed by the question—What is true Christianity?"

He undertook a vigorous study of the Scriptures and other Christian writers (including C. S. Lewis), which eventually won his intellectual assent to the veracity of the historic faith. Around the same time, a friend of his had gotten "soundly converted" at university and, feeling an urgency to secure Packer's salvation, he commended InterVarsity people to him, urging Packer to seek them out once he got to Oxford for his studies. Packer's "nose for reality—real reality, not virtual reality"—compelled him to follow his friend's advice. When he entered Corpus Christi College at Oxford in the fall of 1944, he sought out the IV people, wanting to "get in with the real Christians."

This, in turn, induced another shock.

Packer attended his first evangelistic preaching service of the Oxford Inter-Collegiate Christian Union (OICCU, or CU), and as he listened to the message, a "shocking realization" hit him in the form of a mental picture. He saw himself standing outside looking into a home where a party was in progress. In a spiritual sense, he understood that "they were inside and I was outside." He recognized that one gets in by means of a "personal transaction with the living Lord, the Lord Jesus," and that he had "never actually made that transaction."

The "pointed, perfectly ordinary, pietistic evangelistic sermon" ended with an appeal to receive the Lord Jesus as Savior. Packer recalls, "We all sang 'Just As I Am'—there's no more ordinary way of being converted than to receive the Lord while singing 'Just As I Am'—and that was it. When I went out of the church I knew I was a Christian." (He abandoned Saturday night gigs playing "sloppy clarinet" for the Oxford Bandits jazz combo in deference to attending CU Bible studies.)

Six weeks later he heard Basil Atkinson teach from Revelation and was astonished by the reverence with which the teacher handled the biblical text—a departure from the liberal view of Scripture he had been "stuffed up with" in the Anglicanism of his childhood. These two contradictory notions collided in that moment, he says, and his "skepticism collapsed."

"I can still remember the feeling of surprise—and gladness—as I left the meeting because I knew that I knew that the Bible is the Word of God."

But the new convert soon confronted another contradiction in his faith experience.

Finding the Puritans

"I was an oddity," Packer says.

"I was bad at relationships, an outsider, shy, and an intellectual—I wasn't a sportsman" (the dent in his head saw to that). "Battling his way, as adolescents do," writes McGrath, the young Packer struggled with "manifold urges and surges of discontent and frustration" (Read: emotional disequilibrium, a desire for companionship, sexual longings, loneliness). On top of that, there was the added inconvenience of his operating on a higher intellectual plane than just about everybody he met, which obliged him to battle a degree of pride.

All of this had the cumulative effect of an ever-increasing sense of isolation. "That, with my linear habit of mind, made me an 18-year-old oddball. I was emotionally locked up."

"Let go and let God!" the evangelical ethos of the time proclaimed, which only further confounded the struggling new Christian. This was the voice of the Keswick holiness teaching that prevailed in British evangelicalism at the time. The "expository novelties," McGrath notes, espoused by the Keswick school "promised deeper spiritual enrichment," "full deliverance from sin," and a "closer relationship with Jesus Christ than anything that they yet experienced." In fact, the teaching went, any believer who wasn't experiencing all of this "had not totally surrendered to Christ."

The contradiction tormented Packer. On the one hand, he knew that he had fully surrendered his life to the living Lord. Yet on the other hand, he was not experiencing the "deliverance from sin" and the "victorious life" that holiness teaching perpetuated.

That's when, by "a happy accident," he found the Puritans. Gaining a reputation for bookishness in CU circles, Packer had been asked to oversee the library of the OICCU shortly after his conversion. "Just out of nosiness" ("I'm a nosy person"), he started sniffing through the books. He found an edition of John Owen's On the Mortification of Sin in Believers—pages still uncut—and started reading: "By faith fill thy soul with a due consideration of that provision which is laid up in Jesus Christ; for this end and purpose that all thy lusts, this very lust wherewith thou art entangled, may be mortified by faith. Ponder on this, that though thou art no way able, in or by thyself, to get the conquest of the distemper; though thou art even weary of contending and art utterly ready to faint; yet that there is enough in Jesus Christ to yield thee relief."

Owen became "a lifeline" to him, addressing, engaging, and resolving the issue of regenerate believers wrestling with sin. Writings of other Puritans he subsequently perused had a similar eye-opening, life-giving effect. "When I read, for instance, the second part of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, what impressed me was the way in which Mr. Greatheart, the pastor who is escorting Christiana and her family to the Celestial City, picks up, as he goes along, a string of emotional cripples—Mr. Ready-to-Halt, Mr. Feeble-Mind, and Mr. Despondency.

"The Puritans answered those questions that perplexed me," he says. And more than that, they introduced him to the "whole range" of Christian truth, wrestling with aspects of the Christian life in a rational, yet spiritually enlivened and theologically grounded way. "From the Puritans," he says, "I acquired what I didn't have from the start—that is, a sense of the importance and primacy of truth. Which means theology."

Making inroads

The Puritans inspired Packer to want to share the blessing both with the theologically floundering evangelical minority in Britain and with the theologically murky Church of England. To the evangelicals (a "small, largely ignored minority"), the Puritans' "emphasis on God-centeredness, personal discipline, humility and the primacy of the mind," writes McGrath, offered an antidote to the "pietistic goofiness" (as Packer calls it) that held sway out of the Keswick tradition. To the Anglicans (who composed the majority of British citizens, only 5 percent of whom were active "churchgoers"), the Puritans offered a theological corrective: "I knew that I had a theology that would stand and that I could deploy. One had to challenge the liberal and vague notions [of Anglicanism] to get them out of the way and clear the way for truth."

Packer's decision (in 1947) to seek ordination in the Church of England was part of this mandate (though, McGrath notes, the decision was akin to "Daniel volunteering to enter the lions' den"), as was his decision to pursue further theological training. He had taught for one academic year at Oak Hill College (1948-49), which made him aware (1) that his gifts and disposition would be best deployed in an academic setting, and (2) there was a serious lack of evangelicals with doctorates in Britain (only one other evangelical that he knew of held a doctorate at the time).

As part of this mission, in the midst of preparing for ordination and pursuing his doctoral research, and with the Puritans ever on his mind, Packer launched the Puritan Studies Conferences in 1950: an annual two-day gathering for discussing papers dealing with Puritan ideas. "The Conferences proceeded on the assumption that the Puritans were to be studied as potential guides for the modern church," McGrath writes, in order to introduce to a new generation of theological students "a powerful and persuasive vision of the Christian life, in which theology, biblical exposition, spirituality and preaching were shown to be mutually indispensable."

The then well-known and revered evangelical preacher Martyn Lloyd-Jones threw his weight behind the conferences, enthusiastically endorsing and chairing them, which served as a catalyst in their subsequent success. In effect, McGrath notes, "the Conference acted as the nucleus of a new and emerging constituency within British evangelicalism" with the added benefit of keeping Packer in close proximity with his non-Anglican free-church brethren.

He was ordained in December 1952, having navigated the ordination process (despite the examining chaplain's complaint that his theology was equivalent to "intellectual bulldozing") and assumed his first pastoral role as curate (assistant pastor) at Saint John's in Harborne. He heard no heavenly voices calling him to youth ministry, though he dutifully accompanied the Boys Brigade to camp ("I won't pretend I enjoyed it") and faithfully visited "the fish lady"—known for the bag of fish she carried—enduring her tea: "She kept a pot of tea on the hob so that by afternoon it was scummy and tasted horrible, but this was the Birmingham way of living with tea."

But "the best of all I did," Packer recalls, "was the weekly doctrine class. All the youngish people wanted to learn about their faith, and I introduced them to their heritage. They loved it. I gave them something they discovered they wanted."

Longings fulfilled

On the academic and ministerial fronts he had been making strides toward his goals. On the personal front he remained awkward, shy, and longing for companionship. However, shortly before his ordination, the providential double booking of a friend was to turn the tide in this aspect of Packer's life. The friend asked Packer to cover for him at one of the speaking engagements, and Packer agreed, despite still feeling somewhat out of his comfort zone in public situations.

His feeling of awkwardness was exacerbated when everyone in attendance, at the end of the evening, left him standing alone at the speaker's table while they mingled casually with one another.

Everyone, that is, except a young nursing student who redressed this "terrible rudeness." "I was affronted by the fact that everybody else around me was ignoring the speaker," says

Kit, Packer's wife of 43 years. "We Welsh people generally try to make strangers at ease."

Kit left her comfort zone, too, to welcome the visiting speaker who stood awkwardly before her and who, she recounts, spoke "remarkably like my minister, Dr. Martyn Lloyd-Jones."

That first meeting with Kit Mullett had J. I. Packer tossing sleepless in his bed. "I couldn't get her out of my mind," he says. He was sure that when he got up to read Proverbs 31 that sleepless night (the account of the godly woman), the writer had Kit in mind. ("She seemed to be there.")

Kit possessed all those qualities that he, in his bookish way, seemed to lack. She was practical, relational, lively, independent. He liked the "individuality" he saw in her on their first walk in "the wood" when she took her shoes off.

She's Welsh; he's English. (She highlights that point.) When they take walks together, she meanders (still sometimes barefoot), carrying binoculars, watching the chickadees, and tracing the flight of the bald eagle; he bolts, wanting to get there and back again. (He keeps his shoes on.)

She moves comfortably into "the debating mode" (Packer notes: "She's not sure she can see coherence in my position on women in ministry"). He demurs: "I'm an analyst. I'm not a debater."

"When he took an interest, I was surprised," Kit recalls. "I still am, actually."

They courted for 18 months "under the eye of my vicar" and paid for their own wedding in July of 1954—the week after he turned in his 500-page dissertation on Richard Baxter.

So his longings for companionship were filled to overflowing in his new bride, and Packer grew more sure of his mission and mandate. He left his pastoral duties at Saint John's and assumed the position of assistant lecturer (soon to become senior tutor) at Tyndale Hall in Bristol (1955).

Lifter of drooping heads

In Britain at this time, a young American crusade evangelist named Billy Graham brought his crusades (1954 and 1955) and ignited evangelical fires. Christian unions were popping up in the universities at a rate heretofore unseen. This surge in popular evangelical enthusiasms unsettled the Anglican establishment. Canon H. K. Luce, headmaster of Durham School, wrote an article in which he posed the question (cited by McGrath): "Is it not time that our religious leaders made it plain that while they respect, or even admire, Dr. Graham's sincerity and personal power, they cannot regard fundamentalism as likely to issue in anything but disillusionment and disaster for educated men and women in this twentieth century?"

Packer answered that question. He took pen in hand and offered "the definitive evangelical response" in his first book, Fundamentalism and the Word of God (1958). In the book, Packer demonstrated cogently and rationally that authentic evangelicalism, contrary to Luce's remarks, carried all the intellectual rigor that the liberals presumed to be their domain, while simultaneously turning their flawed argumentation back upon them. As Valentine Cunningham put it in his review of McGrath's book in The Pelican Record: "It felt good to have Packer on one's side, this gangly bespectacled exegete with the Gloucestershire burr in his voice, a sort of John Arlott of biblical commentary, running up to bowl his devastating slow left-arm deliveries."

Says Packer: "The response was simply to outflank the criticisms by showing that they applied to the critics much more than they applied to those at whom they were first directed."

Robert Horn, former editor of the Evangelical Times, said that the book lifted the “drooping heads” of a whole generation of young people. He “made doctrine exciting,” as one observer noted, showing the skeptics that Scripture could be trusted after all and reassuring the pietists that “reason” could be their friend. The book established Packer as the voice for a credible, intellectually rigorous yet soundly orthodox evangelicalism.

Making strides in his mission, he undertook another project similar to his Puritan Conferences. Just as these (thriving by now) offered a venue for Puritan thought to infiltrate British evangelicalism, his next brainchild, Latimer House (launched in 1961), was Packer’s means to create a venue for Anglican evangelicals to assert their voices within their denomination.

Packer wanted to revive “authentic Anglicanism”—a heritage, he says, that had been “in eclipse” since 1944. “The shapers of Anglicanism were evangelicals—Cranmer, the Puritans, the Clapham sect, Wilberforce,” he says. “I wanted to re-establish it in its own heritage.” So in 1961 Packer left Bristol to become librarian (later warden) at Latimer House.

On the home front, the Packers had settled into family life with their three children, Naomi, Ruth, and Martin. “Kit wanted and got animals,” Packer notes, including (at one point or another) hamsters, rabbits, white mice, cats, and dogs—most notably Rocky the “black nondescript” who, prior to his homegoing last year, penned the yearly Packer Christmas newsletter.

Packer enjoyed his young children, though Kit recalls that at times—especially when he was writing a book—“he wasn’t always with us.” Packer left home management in the capable hands of his wife, though, he says, “I invested more of myself in parenting than my father invested in me.”

On other fronts, however, Packer was soon to enter a season of testing and heartache. With the ascendancy of the World Council of Churches in the sixties, denominational allegiance to the Church of England became suspect. Some feared that the WCC would become “a ‘superchurch’ run from Geneva,” as Packer puts it, and began advocating “jumping ship” from the denomination to form a separate evangelical alliance. Packer’s friend and Puritan Conference partner, Martyn Lloyd-Jones, became the most vociferous spokesman for this position. At a gathering of the Second National Assembly of Evangelicals (October 1966), organized by the Evangelical Alliance, Lloyd-Jones “issued what was widely understood to be a passionate call for evangelicals within the mainstream churches to ‘come out’ and, in effect, form a denomination of their own,” McGrath writes. John Stott, who was chairing the session, feared that the message might spark a mass exodus on the part of the younger, impressionable evangelical leaders in attendance. So he “broke the ordinary rules of procedure,” says Packer, and “spoke ‘off the cuff.’” Stott intervened to affirm that evangelicals could and should remain within their denominations in order to help bring about renewal from within. (“It started a great row that didn’t die down,” Packer says.)

This unexpected turn resulted in a rift within British evangelicalism over whether evangelicals should remain within the Church of England. So the gathering that was supposed to “serve the purpose to advance the cause of unity and viable strategies for keeping evangelicalism alive in Britain” had the opposite effect.

Trouble three times over

Packer told me once: “Like a good pietist I’ve always wanted peace, and like Richard Baxter I’ve been involved with trouble, trouble, trouble all the way.” This was never more true than the season he entered in the early seventies, what I would call the opening bell of J. I. Packer’s extraordinary match. Several forces converged that set the conditions wherein Packer found himself, at some points, scrambling to save his academic career, and at other points, groping for his place in the British evangelical arena.

By the late sixties, the unity between Anglican evangelicals and the free-church brethren was disintegrating; a “charismatic tidal wave” (as Packer calls it) deluged the British evangelical scene and had begun to erode some of the theological underpinnings Packer had labored to establish; and Packer himself was itching for new challenges, sensing that Latimer House, now well established and thriving, no longer demanded his leadership.

The first round, to continue the wrestling metaphor, commenced with Packer’s formal “disfellowshipping” by Martyn Lloyd-Jones in 1970. The two had not seen eye-to-eye on the role of evangelicals within Anglicanism, and Lloyd-Jones had hoped that Packer would eventually see things his way. (Packer had been his “blue-eyed boy,” says Kit. Once, when she went to Lloyd-Jones for a pastoral visit, her concerns were subsumed by his urging her to persuade Jim to come over to his side.)

The break occurred as a result of a book Packer had written with other Anglicans, two of whom were Anglo-Catholics, in the effort to overturn the “Methodist union scheme” (a movement to unite the denomination with the Methodists). From Lloyd-Jones’s perspective, Packer had gone too far in collaborating with the Anglo-Catholics, though Packer maintains that Lloyd-Jones “read into [the book] a good deal that it hadn’t said.”

Lloyd-Jones also abruptly ended what had become two decades of flourishing Puritan Conferences. Packer, in turn, was unceremoniously sacked by other committees and boards, including the editorial board of The Evangelical Magazine. McGrath writes that a "leading independent evangelical went so far as to advance the view that Packer could 'no longer be regarded as an evangelical.'"

Lloyd-Jones, Packer reflects, was "the greatest man I ever knew." But he was also inviting evangelicals "on a road that led to nowhere." ("Great men can make great mistakes.") Packer was committed to going the long haul within the denomination. "Whatever anything else Jim was, he was an Anglican," says Kit. "He would never desert the Church of England." Despite his personal affection for Lloyd-Jones, Packer never felt that "the free-church men could ever grab the tiller" in his quest "to renew the church in reformed Christianity."

"I DON'T THINK I EVER
LAPSED INTO BITTERNESS,
BUT IT HAD ON OCCASION MADE ME
WONDER WHAT GOOD I AM, ESPECIALLY, TO THE CHRISTIAN WORLD
IN THE SHORT TERM."

Still another crisis loomed, sounding the buzzer for round two. Theological schools in Britain faced a steady decrease of candidates for ordination, and Packer, having left Latimer House to assume the role of principal of Tyndale Hall in Bristol in 1970, had undertaken an aggressive plan to increase student membership and assemble a sterling faculty there (hence his recognition as the "reforming principal").

To maintain viability, proposals to merge some colleges were introduced. Tyndale, Packer's college, remained under a threatening cloud. "Theological colleges across England, irrespective of their theological tradition, found themselves plunged into fierce and bitter battles for survival," writes McGrath.

John Stott and others, wanting to ensure the survival of evangelical colleges, submitted (September 1970) an unofficial report proposing the consolidation of the three Bristol colleges: Tyndale, Clifton, and Dalton House (a women's college). The commission overseeing the mergers countered (October) with a different recommendation: All schools in Bristol would be shut down, with Clifton merging with Wycliffe Hall in Oxford and Packer's Tyndale with Saint John's in Nottingham.

This was a devastating blow to Packer. He had worked hard and paid a high price for forging a new vision for theological training within Anglicanism and had only just begun to turn the tide at Tyndale. He recognized that if this merger with Saint John's proceeded (which neither school relished), his vision and leadership would be disenfranchised, since Saint John's stood as the stronger, more self-sufficient of the two schools.

Following Packer's lead, Tyndale responded (January 1971) that a move to Nottingham was unworkable. The commission, in turn, countered—fine—Tyndale would be closed.

Shock gave way to disbelief, which gave way to outrage. Packer found himself in the middle of a firestorm trying to save his college, and by now, the students themselves had entered the fray trying to overturn the decision. The General Synod of the Church of England debated the issue and ultimately (February) offered Tyndale a reprieve: "In the opinion of the House of Bishops, the continuation of training for ordinands at Bristol is only possible if Tyndale Hall, Clifton and Dalton . . . agree to amalgamate on the Clifton site."

Hence, Trinity College was born and an evangelical presence in Bristol was saved. But Packer's troubles weren't over. The leadership question for the newly formed school had to be addressed, and a triumvirate arrangement was considered the most desirable, with one member from each college assuming a leadership position. Packer was recommended (for obvious reasons) to represent Tyndale in the triumvirate.

But things got more complicated. In the planning sessions between the potential leaders, Packer unintentionally alienated the Clifton leadership, who felt Packer was dictating the terms of the triumvirate. He wasn't. They probably took offense at Packer's linear "habit of mind" and subsequent style of communication. (Once he starts a thought he simply cannot stop until the thought has been carried through to its logical conclusion. There's no interrupting him.)

Women of the HARVEST

With women representing over half the missionaries serving overseas, the need is great to connect these women to each other. Welcome to Women of the Harvest!

"I don't generally subscribe to magazines, so when I received your premiere issue, I was not at all interested, until I opened it and started to read. Instead of dry 'how to's,' I was reading feelings from the hearts of other women who desperately want to serve God, but who also struggle in the process. I immediately felt a bond with these women and the encouragement that I am not alone."

— C. Hunter, Slovakia

"Until now, there have been limited resources available to women serving in foreign missions. Women of the Harvest is designed for women serving cross-culturally — a connection to each other, with shared experiences and struggles. Women of the Harvest offers hope, encouragement and support to women all around the world. I highly recommend Women of the Harvest as an excellent tool for caring for the women in your missionary family."

stalled further negotiations, derailing the merger. In the end, Packer was vindicated by the bishop, who intervened and saved the merger, but the new arrangement carried the proviso that J. I. Packer not be given any significant leadership role. So rather than serving as dean of studies (part of the triumvirate), Packer was offered the position of "associate principal."

Edged out

Gerald Bray, in his review of McGrath's book in Churchman, commends McGrath for correctly "expos[ing] the moral void at the heart of so much Anglican Evangelicalism." He adds: "Packer, as theologian, was a threat to people like that. The only surprise is that they were prepared to tolerate him at all."

Bray highlights the fact that ten years later, after Packer and his friend and colleague Alec Motyer (who filled the Tyndale triumvirate slot) had left, "Trinity sank to a depth which even the men of Clifton may not have envisaged."

"There are many who remember the Packer-Motyer years as the golden age of Bristol."

So it wasn't all bad news for Packer. As "associate principal," he took advantage of increased opportunities for travel and writing. Knowing God was published in 1973, winning Packer immediate international acclaim, particularly in North America. This, in turn, resulted in his being asked to participate in controversies here. One such conflict that erupted in the U.S. was a foment dubbed "the battle for the Bible," for which Packer was invited to offer input as an objective outsider (for once).

He participated in summit meetings and, later, helped draft key expositions for the International Council on Biblical Inerrancy (ICBI), which he also helped found in 1977. Packer assisted American evangelicals in navigating this delicate debate, leading them to middle ground whereby they could fully embrace "inerrancy" (though Packer prefers the positive terms "totally true/totally trustworthy") without sacrificing common sense and adopting the ultraliteralistic approach advocated by some (like the suggestion that there may have been six, not three, denials of Peter, in the attempt to reconcile inconsistencies in the gospel accounts).

So doors were opening for him across "the puddle." Back in England, however, he was becoming gradually more marginalized. The Church of England's Doctrine Committee (of which Packer was a member) published a statement that treated the orthodox Christian understanding of the person and work of Christ as "an option." This enraged the "ordinary Anglicans" who wondered how a theological stance could be hijacked by so few, and it exacerbated the criticism by non-Anglican evangelicals who felt Packer had surrendered too much by staying with the denomination. Packer, for his part, felt that "the dice were loaded" against them since, as McGrath notes, the evangelicals were "hopelessly outnumbered" on the committee.

On another front, his friend and fellow Anglican evangelical, John Stott, was charting a different course for British evangelicalism than that which Packer had envisioned. Stott orchestrated central conferences for leaders to come together for fellowship and refreshment, with the hope that the inspiration would "trickle down" into the churches. Packer felt that igniting evangelistic fervor in the context of these conferences would diminish the urgency in local congregations. It seemed to be merely a matter of differing emphases, but the overall effect of this, along with these other difficulties, left Packer feeling "the odd man out."

"In the 1970s," he reflects, "I hadn't got any kind of leadership role or direct hearing for the things I wanted to say among evangelicals any more than I did in my Anglican circles. I don't think I ever lapsed into bitterness, but it had on occasion made me wonder what good I am, really, to the Christian world in the short term."

A new turn

Round three.

"Packer left this universe in 1979 for a new life at Regent College, Vancouver," Bray writes in his review, "and Dr. McGrath presents this as a wider opportunity given to him to develop his preaching and teaching ministry." A notion, Bray continues, that is "the exact opposite of the one generally held by Dr. Packer's admirers in England."

"What we were looking for was a new Charles Hodge, or even just a new Louis Berkhof, but what we got was Knowing God," he says. "It has to be recorded that this has been the expectation of the English friends and admirers, and that so far we have felt let down."

Not all Brits concur with Bray's assessment, which McGrath's book attests. And feeling "let down" would hardly describe the sentiment of J. I. Packer's friends and admirers in North America. He thrived at Regent ("without any sort of negative vibes"), and Regent has flourished because of his being there. "In the mid-1970s, Regent was a tiny institution, using borrowed rooms; by the end of the 1980s, Regent was the largest graduate institution of theological education in the region," writes McGrath.

Regent placed Packer in a position to assert a voice in just about every theological discussion that has emerged in contemporary North American evangelicalism—from the role of women, to the function of the Holy Spirit, to the destiny of those who die without Christ. The most recent of these has been his critical role in Evangelicals and Catholics Together (ECT; see CT, Dec. 8, 1997, p. 34).

Packer has helped navigate both sides of this initiative onto common theological ground without diminishing points of disagreement. He coined the phrase "the convergence of the saints" in another context, but ECT could be one such impulse whereby differing sides stand together in areas of agreement, in order to serve a larger purpose (the tack he took with the Anglo-Catholics in overturning the "Methodist scheme").

It should be noted that he has also been disfellowshipped by some American evangelicals for his participation in ECT—despite his obvious and vigorous commitment to Reformed theology and unwillingness to give any ground on critical theological points.

Despite the differences, however, he has played a key role in facilitating the sense of unity and cooperation that has prevailed in ECT (his off-the-cuff after-hours comment to Catholic theologian Richard John Neuhaus that the papacy is "a grotesque institution" notwithstanding).

In the meantime, he continues to generate an unrelenting arsenal of books, pamphlets, and articles—writing a book a year since coming to Regent ("In 1995 three Packer books were published together and I got up to speed"). His books have sold almost 3 million copies (Knowing God, a million and a half in and of itself), and he has earned the status of being the best-selling author in British Columbia.

McGrath appropriately places Packer where he belongs in contemporary evangelicalism, and today's readers should be all the more energized that it has come to pass while J. I. Packer still walks among us.

McGrath summarizes Packer's fourfold approach to evangelical theologizing: "the importance of history" (à la the Puritans); "the primacy of theology" (maintaining that "bad theology hurts people"); "the coherence of theology" (a "heartfelt knowledge of divine things"); and "collaboration without compromise" (or, "convergence of the saints"). Whatever else, theology for Packer is "not merely wrestling with texts, nor yet with ideas, but with the living God."

McGrath concludes: "Any who seek to theologize within great-tradition Christianity . . . will find in Packer a congenial travelling companion who will encourage, nourish, and challenge us as we prepare to enter the new millennium."

At my dinner table not too long ago, Packer couldn't stay his tears when Handel's "For Unto Us a Child Is Born," from Messiah, played in the background. That is because, as Kit says it, "his devotion to the Lord is the reason for everything he's done. His writing, his preaching, his lecturing, his living are all centered on the Lord."

And his love for the church is why Packer prefers the verb form of theology. He told me once that classical jazz is like the church. I thought he might have meant the "charismatic" church, but he meant the church in its truest Reformed sense—a lively, masterful interplay and synergy of members, orchestrated by the Holy Spirit for creating the music of heaven.

When the painful rifts have occurred over the years, he has grieved less for his personal losses and more because, as Kit puts it, "the church is hurt and the Lord is hurt." That is why, ten years after their estrangement in 1970, Packer wrote his friend and colleague Martyn Lloyd-Jones asking to visit him on his forthcoming trip to England. Lloyd-Jones, who had been ill, encouraged him to come.

"I never saw him," Packer says. "He died before I could get there. It didn't make a great deal of difference," he says. "There's always heaven."

Yes, heaven. His thoughts are that high and wide, though his feet are firmly planted here so long as he can continue to have a part in expanding the soul of Christ's bride. "I want to see a focused vision of spiritual maturity—the expansion of the soul is the best phrase I can use for it. That is, a renewed sense of the momentousness of being alive, the sheer bigness and awesomeness of being a human being alive in God's world with light, with grace, with wisdom, with responsibility, with biblical truth.

"I judge rightly or wrongly," he says, "that as a generation, most of us are pygmies as compared with the great-souled Christians of earlier days, the Athanasiuses, the Luthers, the Anselms—Whitefield, Wesley, and Edwards. They were, by the grace of God, bigger people than most of us are."

Valentine Cunningham in his review writes, "Packer stands for an arresting and influential blend of spirituality and theological hard-headedness." The operative word there is "stands." Like my son who gutted his way through an uneven match, achieving something greater than a victory, so the testimony of J. I. Packer transcends the sum total of blows leveled against him. The boy who decades ago nearly died being chased into the street, and who came back later to help bullies with their homework, today seems bigger than most of us.

Each year during the liturgical celebration of the Passion, Christians relive the events of Christ's last week on earth before his resurrection. To highlight this season, we showcase the work of seven contemporary artists who consider the passion, death, and resurrection of Jesus anew with a variety of approaches.

Using a vibrant palette, Tanja Butler communicates the spiritual transaction underlying Jesus' humble act of footwashing and, shown on the cover, Jesus' last meal. The mundane is illumined with joy. In contrast, the subdued tones and foggy atmosphere of her Road to Emmaus (p. 47) create a gentle mood, suggestive of Christ's everlasting patience as he waits for us to recognize him. Butler is a full-time printmaker and painter in rural upstate New York, a stepmother to nine children, and a lifelong Christian whose earliest childhood memories recall images from her parents' illustrated Bible.

Edgar Boevé's Last Supper is startling not only because the artist imagines the disciples around a table on equal terms with the Savior, but because the painting is rendered on a real table top. Boevé taught for decades at Calvin College, where in the 1960s he developed one of the first evangelical art departments and contemporary Christian art galleries.

Wayne Forte's crowing rooster is the traditional Christian symbol for Peter's betrayal of Jesus. Forte's shrilly rendered cock, six feet high in bold, thick lines, reminds us of our continual propensity to fall short of the mark, as did Peter. Forte, a successful California artist from the Philippines, will soon relocate to Brazil.

Bruce Herman's haunting works boldly portray the face of Christ under the burden of his sufferings. As they are partly inspired by self-portraits, they intimate that the Lord is sympathetic to our personal sufferings. The Crowning and The Flogging (shown on the table of contents) are from the book Golgotha, published by Gordon College, where Herman is professor and chair of a burgeoning art department.

Black Sun Crucifixion echoes the distortion and pain found in the Isenheim Altarpiece, Matthias Grunewald's sixteenth-century painting for a congregation of patients with skin lesions. Catling sees that fallen humanity is constantly dealing with its self-inflicted disfigurement and victimization—and that Christ's acceptance of this agonizing part of the human experience reveals his true, tough love for us. sculptor and art professor, Catling lives near Los Angeles.

James Disney's ethereal Christ is otherworldly—neither totally solid, nor spiritually wispy—but his resurrected presence recolors the landscape, cutting through darkness with a golden light. Disney, a full-time Lutheran pastor and self-taught painter, “plucks faces” from his church’s pictorial directory to depict Christ, emulating Renaissance painters who intentionally portrayed Jesus as an ordinary person to invite the viewers’ empathy towards him.

William Weber, an art teacher from Illinois, leaves us with the ineffable peace of Jesus in a figure reminiscent of a timeless icon out of past history, but his Christ is also a modern and expressionistically drawn figure. In this way, the artist affirms the fact that Jesus Christ is as timeless as his peace is everlasting. CI

JESUS V. SANHEDRIN

Why Jesus "lost" his trial.

DARRELL L. BOCK

In recent years, Americans have been bombarded by one sensational criminal trial after another—each one, it seemed, the “trial of the century.” Ironically, this exposure may have given us new eyes for appreciating the details of what Christians believe to be the trial of all time: Jesus bar Joseph v. Sanhedrin.

How would today’s legal analysts characterize this 2,000-year-old trial of a carpenter’s son from the backwaters of Galilee? What would they single out as the highlights, the crucial turning points? How would they understand the charge brought against Jesus?

executed. Then they would zero in on a series of tactical blunders the defendant makes that ultimately cost him his life.

We know that Jesus, after having been betrayed by one of his own followers, was hustled under tight guard to stand before the Sanhedrin, an assembly of Jewish religious leaders whose chief priest at the time was Caiaphas. Fearing the worst, his disciples fled. Peter, however, ventured as far as the building where Jesus was taken for examination. While sitting around a fire with some soldiers in an outside courtyard, Peter feigned ignorance of the controversial teacher being interrogated inside. He knew all too well why his master had been arrested and did not wish to share the same fate.

Because Israel at this time was a puppet Jewish state under the jurisdiction of the Roman Empire, the Sanhedrin did not possess the legal power to sentence a person to death. Only the Roman magistrates could do this. So the assembled Jewish leaders on this Thursday night looked to find some basis for bringing Jesus before the governor—and they tried to do so swiftly since Pilate would be in Jerusalem only for the week of the Passover festival that was just beginning.

To appreciate the importance of this hearing, we must recall the controversy that had attached itself to Jesus’ ministry over the preceding three years. Not only had his miracles and his claims to authority made the religious officials in Jerusalem nervous; Jesus’ approach to Sabbath practice, healings, exorcisms, and sinners ended up challenging the existing religious structure of Judaism.

In short, Jesus was a reformer of Judaism, calling the nation of Israel to repentance. John the Baptist had done this before him, but there was a major difference: John prepared the way for the era of decisive reform, only calling for a heart ready to respond to the changes God might bring; Jesus claimed

UNWELCOME REFORMER

Using the last chapters of the Gospel of Mark as their legal brief, the analysts would probably begin with the end—with the blunt fact that the defendant loses the case and gets to bring that reform. If Jesus were left to lead the people in his unique way, Judaism would never be the same. An official examination before the religious leaders, it is now clear, was inevitable.

UNFAIR HEARING?

It is often suggested that the Jews broke their own legal rules to bring Jesus before the Romans. Often those making this point have used it not to question the breaking of the rules but to show that Mark did not accurately understand Jewish history and blundered in writing his account of Jesus. Or worse yet, Mark and the early Christian community were skewing the facts—creating an anti-Semitic fiction—to slander the Jews by making them, and not the Roman Gentiles, responsible for Jesus' death.

The fact is that these rules, while not written down until about A.D. 170 in the Mishnah, did record an older oral tradition. One section of the Mishnah, titled "Sanhedrin," describes the legal process required in a Jewish trial where the defendant faces possible death. It states that the high priest should not participate in the questioning, the verdict cannot be given on the same day as the trial, blasphemy requires God's name be explicitly pronounced, and someone is required to speak on behalf of the defendant.

None of these things is in the record of Jesus' examination. But recent research—including my own—shows that the Jewish leadership very likely did not view this hearing as a formal trial but more as something comparable to a grand jury inquiry. Since they would not be able to make the decision to put Jesus to death, Jewish rules concerning a capital trial did not apply to this case. All they were considering was whether Jesus could be brought before the Romans as a political subversive. Could he be viewed as such a public threat that Rome would wish to remove him?

A PUBLIC THREAT

In an effort to find if Jesus could be tried for a political crime, the questioners began by reviewing Jesus' statements about the temple. Already in Jesus' day the temple had become the center of a "church-state" compromise in which the Romans treated the temple with an exceptional respect. History had taught them that anything less could lead to public chaos or worse.

The ancient Jewish historian Josephus notes several disturbances in Jerusalem during this era that had inflamed the Jewish crowds. One occurred shortly after Jesus' death when a Roman soldier "mooned" the Jewish crowd from a temple portico during a festival, creating a public riot that left the streets strewn with bodies. And both Jews and Romans were ever conscious of the Maccabean revolts, which began in 167 B.C. when a Gentile ruler marched into the temple and sacrificed a pig. The act, representing the enforced Hellenization of Palestinian Jewish culture, so inflamed the Jews that they waged a three-year war to free themselves from Syrian rule.

Even the Roman governor Pilate, who would sentence Jesus to death after he had been handed over to him by the high priest, had brought trouble upon himself by placing banners with eagles on them in Jerusalem to indicate Jewish subservience to Rome. Josephus writes that "when the Jews again petitioned him [to remove the standards], he gave a prearranged signal to his soldiers to surround them, and threatened to punish them with immediate death if they did not end their riot and return to their own homes. But they threw themselves on the ground and bared their throats, declaring that they would gladly welcome death rather than dare to transgress the wisdom of their laws." Pilate, astounded at the firmness of their guarding of the laws, immediately transferred the images from Jerusalem to Caesarea.

In the light of this history, Jesus' remarks about the temple and his actions would have been considered nothing less than explosive, and it is little surprise that the Sanhedrin focused on this potent issue. Yet Mark 14:53-60 tells us the presentation of witnesses got nowhere with this issue: "Some stood up and gave false testimony against him, saying, 'We heard him say, "I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days I will build another, not made with hands."' But even on this point their testimony did not agree." The Sanhedrin needed to find another avenue of challenge.

THE FATAL MISSTATEMENT

At this point Caiaphas moved the inquiry toward another potential political charge. Urging Jesus to defend himself, Caiaphas asked, "Are you the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One?"

Three points in his question are important. First, the term Messiah refers to the promised King of Israel, making the query a political and not just a religious one. Claiming to be Messiah was not necessarily blasphemous; in itself it was not a claim to divinity. But a positive answer to the high priest's question would mean that the leaders could take Jesus to Pilate and claim that the teacher claimed to be a king who would deliver Israel from her Gentile enemies. The hope for such a king was found in the Hebrew Scriptures, was feared by King Herod at the time of Jesus' birth, and was reflected in recent Jewish works, such as Psalms of Solomon 17-18.

Second, the term Son of the Blessed One did not mean all that it does to Christians today. It was a regal title held by God's anointed (2 Sam. 7:14; Ps. 2).

And third, the Jewish practice of showing reverence for the name of God by not pronouncing it can be seen in the way Caiaphas calls God "the Blessed One." This detail indicates the authenticity of Mark's account.

Jesus' reply gave the leaders far more than they dared hope for. And it was on this point that today's legal analysts would agree Jesus got himself into trouble—of all the questions he had refused to answer, he should have taken the Fifth on this one. Jesus replies simply, "I am," and then goes on to raise the stakes of his claim—"and 'you will see the Son of Man seated at the right hand of the Power,' and 'coming with the clouds of heaven.'"

Combining allusions to Daniel 7:13-14 and Psalm 110:1, he evokes images of a figure who is given authority to vindicate God's people. The phrases seated at the right hand of the Power and coming with the clouds of heaven make it clear that Messiah was not all that Jesus claimed to be. To come in the clouds was a figure of speech reserved for deity (Num. 10:34; Ps. 104:3; Isa. 19:1).

Though Jesus shared the sense of reverence for God's name by referring to him as the Power, his claim was that he would be placed at God's right hand, serving as the one who represents and vindicates God's people. This was more than saying he represented God's presence to the people as the priest does when he goes into the earthly Holy of Holies. Jesus was claiming his own presence, and authority came directly from above.

Mark records that, at this, Caiaphas "tore his clothes and said, 'Why do we still need witnesses? You have heard his blasphemy! What is your decision?' All of them condemned him as deserving death."

Anyone who understands how the Jews felt about the holiness and uniqueness of God's presence would appreciate how unusual (and offensive) Jesus' claim sounded. Neither is it incidental that the New Testament later used the phrase "at the right hand" 14 times to proclaim Jesus' authority as the promised one of God. (A few Jewish works did contemplate the possibility of a great luminary such as Moses or Enoch going into God's presence to aid in his work, but such claims were highly controversial.)

For the Sanhedrin, this Galilean teacher was no great luminary. Jesus simply and confidently proclaimed that this position at God's right hand would be his and that God would justify his claim to that position. In fact, he said that he would one day judge the very leaders examining him. The real trial one day would be his.

THE LAST WORD

Jesus' answer sets the stage for a story that today would lead the evening news of all three major networks. Speaking over a video clip of the high priest ripping his robe, the analysts would explain how Jesus not only had affirmed he was Messiah—getting himself into political trouble by threatening the existing government leadership—but also had made a second tactical blunder through raising the religious ire of the Sanhedrin by blaspheming their God. This, along with his denying the judicial authority of the Sanhedrin, gave the counsel even more reason to dislike him and push for a death sentence under the Romans.

At this point, Jesus is taken before Pilate. The political charge works and stirs the emotions of the crowd in urging Pilate to release the insurrectionist Barabbas instead of Jesus. Jesus is sentenced and crucified—a figure no more important to world history, so far as anyone can tell, than Barabbas or the other troublemakers who keep reproducing themselves in Palestine.

The legal analysts would describe Jesus' fate as the result of his poor defense strategy. And they would be right, except for one overlooked possibility: that Jesus had spoken the truth about being Messiah, the kind that would judge from the right hand of the Father. Three short days later that truth set Jesus free; God literally raised Jesus from the dead. What had been a very bad Friday suddenly looked like Good Friday. Or as one exceptional legal analyst by the name of Paul saw it, Jesus "was declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead" (Rom. 1:4). What better defense could there be?

GRAVE MATTERS

Take away the Resurrection and the center of Christianity collapses.

N. T. WRIGHT

CLEMENCE BUTTS

On Palm Sunday 1996 the London Sunday Times ran a feature about the tomb of Jesus, suggesting that a new discovery threatened the basis of Christianity. Two BBC producers went looking for fresh material for an Easter Sunday program. They wanted to stimulate discussion on the nature of the Resurrection. Supposing, they asked, someone actually found the bones of Jesus lying around in Palestine: What would that do to Christian faith?

So they looked for ossuaries—bone boxes. They found one inscribed “Jesus, son of Joseph” (actually, they found more than one, but they only followed up one). It had been found in a family tomb; and in the same family tomb were other boxes, labeled Joseph, Mary, another Mary, a Matthew, and someone called Judah, described as “the son of Jesus.” The boxes were empty: vandals had apparently got there first, possibly in antiquity. Now, journalists are good at putting two and two together and making seventeen. Could this be Jesus’ tomb? Would it cast doubt on the very foundations of Christianity?

The first thing to say is that, even if nobody had ever said Jesus of Nazareth had been raised to life, the probability is still enormously high that this would not have been the tomb of the Jesus, Mary, and Joseph we know from the Gospels. “Mary” is by far the most common female name in the period; “Joseph” and “Jesus” are two of the most common male names, with Judah—or Judas—not far behind.

Discovering a tomb with these names in one family is rather like an archaeologist two thousand years hence finding an English tomb with parents called Philip and Elizabeth and children called Charles and Anne, and claiming that this must be the British royal family. The Israeli archaeologists, none of them interested in defending Christianity, were the first to pooh-pooh the idea of this being the tomb of Jesus of Nazareth.

Second, if it had been the tomb of Jesus and his family, there are serious oddities. Why is it in Jerusalem, when the family lived in Nazareth where, presumably, Joseph had died some time before Jesus' public ministry? Why is there no mention of James, Jesus' most famous brother, or of James and Simon (as listed in Mark 6:3, along with some unnamed sisters)? And why is there a son of Jesus? There is no evidence whatever that Jesus had children, whether in or out of wedlock; his family—that is, his brothers and nephews—were well known in the early church. Sixty years after Jesus' death, his grandnephews were accused by the Roman emperor Domitian of being part of a would-be royal family. If Jesus had had a son, people would have known. It would have mattered.

But the most serious problem is yet to come, and this points forward to the real message of Easter: Bone boxes—ossuaries—were used in the second stage of a two-stage burial process. Many first-century Jews were buried this way. First they were laid on a slab, wrapped in cloth with spices. The tomb was a cave, not a hole in the ground. It would have a movable stone door; the family and friends would in due course lay other bodies on other shelves in the same cave. Then, a year or more later, when all the flesh had decomposed, relatives or friends would return to collect the bones and place them in an ossuary, a box roughly two feet by one foot by one foot, which would then be stored away either in recesses within the same cave or somewhere else. In other words, the burial of Jesus as recorded in the Gospels was only the first stage of an intended two-stage burial.

So, did anyone ever think of going back to the tomb to collect Jesus' bones and put them in an ossuary? No, they didn't! The whole early church knew that Jesus' body wasn't in the tomb. They believed that God had raised Jesus to life again, transforming his body in the process. This wasn't a resurrection, a journey back into the present life; it was a resurrection, a going on through death and out the other side into a new mode of physicality, the beginning of God's new creation.

If the disciples had believed that what they called the "resurrection" was just a "spiritual" event, leaving the body in the tomb, someone sooner or later would have had to go back to collect Jesus' bones and store them properly. The tomb was designed, like most such tombs of the period, as a family tomb. As additional family members died, the relatives would in due course have come again with their bodies, to lay them elsewhere in the tomb. The ledge where Jesus had been laid would be needed again. But of course, if anyone had at any stage gone back to tidy up Jesus' bones and put them in an ossuary, that would indeed have destroyed Christianity before it had even properly begun. Even those contemporary scholars who deny that Jesus was raised bodily from the dead are clear that all the early Christians thought he had been, and that they made it the basis of their whole lives.

So the question of the ossuaries, when we explore it thoroughly, provides paradoxically a sort of negative evidence in favor of Jesus' resurrection. Not only is the tomb the journalists highlighted not Jesus' tomb. By drawing attention to the two-stage burial process, they have reminded us of how impossible it is to imagine Christianity getting off the ground at all if the second stage of the burial process had ever been carried out. Make no bones about it. In their eagerness to find news, the journalists have accidentally highlighted the good news.

WHAT EASTER FAITH MEANS

Someone on a radio show in Holy Week, after the original Sunday Times article, declared that it didn't matter if Jesus' bones were still lying around Palestine somewhere. "I expect to go to heaven when I die," he said, "and I won't be taking my bones with me; so I don't see why Jesus shouldn't have done the same."

I suspect that this idea, or something like it, is quite widespread, and it's worth pointing out the mistake. Belief in Jesus' resurrection is not the belief that Jesus has simply "gone to heaven" after his death, as though Jesus were like a great saint or martyr whom God has received into his presence with honor. Jews believed that about all sorts of people; it wouldn't have been new; it wouldn't have been news.

Easter faith always was the belief that Jesus went through death into a new sort of bodily existence in which his original body was transformed into a body with new characteristics and properties. When Paul, the first Christian to write about the resurrection, draws conclusions from Jesus' resurrection about our future resurrection, he says that those who are still alive at the end of time will have their bodies changed. He talks about seeds and plants, about acorns and oaks. Our bodies won't be abandoned; they will be transformed.

The message of the Resurrection

So what was the Resurrection all about, as far as the early Christians were concerned? And what on earth—and I mean on earth—does it mean for the world and the church at the end of the twentieth century?

The early Christians very quickly came to understand what had happened to Jesus in terms of the old Jewish, biblical belief that the living God was one day going to solve the problem of Israel's exile and oppression. By doing so, God was going to solve the problem of evil and injustice in the whole world. That is what it means to say that the Resurrection took place "according to the scriptures": it was the fulfillment of prophetic promises and long-cherished hopes. Putting it succinctly, the Resurrection demonstrated that the Cross was a victory, not a defeat.

As Paul says, if Christ is not raised, your faith is futile, and you are still in your sins (1 Cor. 15:17). But if Christ has been raised, then this shows that on the cross he defeated death, and hence sin, and hence all evil and injustice, once and for all. Easter is the unveiling of God's answer to the problems of the world.

The early Christian belief in the resurrection of Jesus was a belief about something that actually happened within this real world, not simply a belief about a transcendent dimension, a spiritual or otherworldly reality that leaves this world behind. Likewise, the continuing message of the Resurrection is precisely not that "there is a life after death." There is life after death, and all God's people will inherit it; but the point is that it won't be what most modern Westerners think of as "life after death." It will involve God's people being given new bodies, like Jesus' body, to share in the new heavens and new earth that God will make.

WHY EASTER MATTERS

The message of the Resurrection is that this present world matters; that the problems and pains of this present world matter; that the living God has made a decisive bridgehead into this present world with his healing and all-conquering love; and that, in the name of this strong love, all the evils, all the injustices, and all the pains of the present world must now be addressed with the news that healing, justice, and love have won the day. That's why we pray: "Thy kingdom come, on earth as it is in heaven." Make no bones about it: Easter Day was the first great answer to that prayer.

If Easter faith is simply about believing that God has a nice comfortable afterlife for some or all of us, then Christianity becomes a mere pie-in-the-sky religion instead of a kingdom-on-earth-as-it-is-in-heaven religion. If Easter faith is simply about believing that Jesus is risen in some "spiritual" sense, leaving his body in the tomb, then Christianity turns into a let-the-world-stew-in-its-own-juice religion, instead of a kingdom-on-earth-as-it-is-in-heaven religion. If Easter faith is only about me, and perhaps you, finding a new dimension to our own personal spiritual lives in the here and now, then Christianity becomes simply a warmth-in-the-heart religion instead of a kingdom-on-earth-as-it-is-in-heaven religion. It becomes focused on me and my survival, my sense of God, my spirituality, rather than outwards on God and on God's world that still needs the kingdom message so badly.

But if Jesus Christ is truly risen from the dead, Christianity tion is that this present world matters.

becomes what the New Testament insists that it is: good news for the whole world, news that warms our hearts precisely because it isn't just about warming hearts. The living God has in principle dealt with evil once and for all, and is now at work, by his own Spirit, to do for us and the whole world what he did for Jesus on that first Easter Day.

That is why we who celebrate Easter do so with material things: water in baptism and bread and wine at the Lord's Supper. Easter is about the living God claiming the world of space, time, and matter as his own. That is why Christians celebrate it with candles and flowers and incense and processions and banners and, above all, music: the world of creation has been reclaimed by the living and healing God. That is why we who celebrate Easter after a Lenten fast do so not with a guilty sense of going back to things that are tainted with sin, but with the joyful sense of celebrating the goodness of God's good creation in all its rich variety.

HOW WE CELEBRATE EASTER

The celebration of Easter calls us, one and all, to delight in God's way of holiness: not a negative, gloomy holiness, but a positive giving of ourselves to God in the knowledge that his way is the way of true delight, of true fulfillment. And that is why the celebration of Easter, in a world, a country, and a region where injustice, violence, degradation, and all manner of wickedness are still endemic, makes the most powerful symbolic statement that we are not prepared to tolerate such things—that God is not prepared to tolerate such things—and that we will work, and plan, and pray, and vote with all the energy of God to implement the victory of Jesus over them all. True Easter faith, true Easter celebration, and true Easter holiness must issue in true Easter agendas.

Recall the old jibe of Karl Marx and others, that Christianity lulls people into being content with their lot or content to look on other people's misery and injustice because it speaks only about a spiritualized heaven in the future and a spiritual experience here and now. That jibe is a fair critique of a watered-down Christianity that tries to say that Jesus' body, like John Brown's, stayed amoudering in the grave while his soul went marching on. But it misses entirely the point of the true Christian belief in the Resurrection.

Notice how, in the Gospels, all the first witnesses of the Resurrection run. Half the references in the Gospels to people running occur in the Resurrection stories: the women run from the tomb, Peter and John run to the tomb, the disciples in Emmaus hurry back to Jerusalem. Where is that energy in the church today, a God-given energy that can't wait to get the good news out and to implement it in the world? If it is lacking, could it have something to do with the fact that far too many Christians have been lulled into thinking that God isn't really concerned with this world, so that the Resurrection of Jesus is not about something happening within this world, so that the only thing that matters is my private otherworldly salvation?

The bodily resurrection of Jesus isn't a take-it-or-leave-it thing, as though some Christians are welcome to believe it and others are welcome not to believe it. Take it away, and the whole picture is totally different. Take it away, and Karl Marx was probably right to accuse Christianity of ignoring the problems of the material world. Take it away, and Sigmund Freud was probably right to say that Christianity is a wish-fulfillment religion.

Take it away, and Friedrich Nietzsche was probably right to say that Christianity is a religion for wimps. Put it back, and you have a faith that can take on the postmodern world that looks to Marx, Freud, and Nietzsche as its prophets; you can beat them at their own game with the Easter news that the foolishness of God is wiser than human wisdom, and the weakness of God is stronger than human strength.

Those who celebrate the mighty resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ, therefore, have an awesome and nonnegotiable responsibility. When we say "Alleluia! Christ is risen," we are saying that Jesus is Lord of the world, and that the present would-be lords of the world are not. When we sing, in the old hymn, that "Judah's Lion burst his chains and crushed the serpent's head," are we ready to put that victory into practice? Are we ready to speak up for, and to take action on behalf of, those even in our own local community, let alone farther afield, who are quietly being crushed by uncaring and unjust systems? Are we ready to speak up for the truth of the gospel over the dinner table and in the coffee bar, and in the council chamber?

Let's make no bones about it: If Easter isn't good news, then there is no good news. But if it is—if it is true that Jesus Christ is risen indeed—then Easter Day, and the Easter message, is the true sun which, when it rises, puts all other suns to shame. CT

Good News for Women?

Inspired by Promise Keepers, upbeat events for women are flourishing while avoiding divisive issues.

MARY CAGNEY

Patsy Clairmont walks on stage with a long string of rubber bands. Holding the elastic array at arm's length, she cries out, "Warning, warning, hormonal woman ahead."

"Often, my emotions cause me to have stretch marks," explains Clairmont, the bestselling author of God Uses Cracked Pots (Focus on the Family, 1991). "They pull me this way and that way." The audience of 5,000 laughing women roars in approval.

It's the women's turn. In scenes reminiscent of the Promise Keepers (PK) men's movement, women are coming together across the United States. Last year, about 197,000 women attended 15 conferences organized by Women of Faith. This year, Women of Faith's leadership is projecting double that total for 29 conferences under the theme Bring Back the Joy.

Other groups have taken advantage of the surging attendance at women's conferences. Aspiring Women, Focus on the Family (Renewing the Heart), and Time Out have scheduled events for women throughout 1998. In all, about 600,000 women are expected to attend these gatherings in 1998, compared to the 683,000 men who attended PK stadium events in 1997 (not counting Stand in the Gap, PK's October gathering on the Mall in Washington, D.C.). Typically, the women's events start on Friday and run all day Saturday, with admission fees ranging from $25 to $60.

Although they were inspired by Promise Keepers, these women's conferences have different goals and a different ethos. For PK, men are encouraged to "stand in the gap" with God for the benefit of home, country, and church. They do this by pledging to keep seven promises that apply biblical principles of righteousness, especially with regard to their commitments to their wives and children.

In contrast, a primary goal of many of the women's conferences is to give women a time out from their harried schedules and to extend comfort and companionship. Clairmont, who for years agonized over agoraphobia, a chronic fear of public spaces, says, "I think the main struggle of women today is loneliness." She says contemporary life's frenzied pace presents women with emotional challenges that few have faced before. "I use rubber bands to show how women's emotions work. I've learned not to mind an emotional day."

FILLING A NICHE: The burgeoning women's conferences are taking place in the context of millions of PK-influenced husbands and fathers taking a greater interest in home life.

Women of Faith and Aspiring Women, two of the largest conference series, were started by men inspired by PK weekends, which are a combination of revival meeting and spiritual pep rally.

Mike Hyatt, founding partner of Aspiring Women conferences, attended a PK meeting in 1993. "I went to a PK meeting and thought, Why isn't there something like this for women?" says Hyatt, a Christian publishing veteran, currently associate publisher of Thomas Nelson in Nashville. New Life Clinics cofounder Stephen Arterburn says of the Women of Faith conferences, "I really believe that the idea was a gift from God." Initially, Arterburn met with Lisa Harper, director of Renewing the Heart conferences, to learn how they organized their meetings.

Arterburn says, "The clinics always did conferences dealing with problems, and the response was underwhelming." He says they revised the conference focus "to see how many more people we could reach by celebrating what is good about life." Women of Faith recruited top female Christian speakers and musicians. They put a spotlight on encouragement, sharing sorrows and joys from their own lives. The changes struck a chord. In 1996, 38,000 flocked to its Joyful Journey conferences, and in 1997, 197,000 women attended.

Unlike PK, the women's conferences rarely focus on confession, repentance, and recommitment. "I felt women had had enough guilt and needed more encouragement," says Aspiring Women's Hyatt. "Women tend to be hyper-responsible in our society and culture. The message needs to be different for women." From Hyatt's perspective, the principal needs of women include overcoming a poor self-image, coping with marital problems, and guidance in financial matters.

Aspiring Women and Women of Faith, both for-profit organizations, have partnered with some of the evangelical movement's largest organizations.

At the conferences, products and services are available through display booths. Hyatt is up-front about whom Aspiring Women is trying to reach, saying, "We're going after the type of person [who] goes into a Christian bookstore." At Women of Faith events, New Life and their Remuda clinics (which specialize in eating disorders) are on hand to provide information about their counseling services. Much of the merchandise available at a local Christian bookstore is on hand, including women's study Bibles, apparel, and magazines (including CT's sister publication TODAY'S CHRISTIAN WOMAN, which has a partnership agreement with Women of Faith). And many of the speakers hold book signings.

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS: Despite the influence of Promise Keepers, the focus of these women's conferences has much in common with secular self-improvement and motivational seminars: Disorders are the order of the day, and victimhood almost always precedes victory. Most speakers describe the defining moment in their own lives as an experience of intense adversity testing their Christian faith.

The life story of Sheila Walsh, a Women of Faith speaker, is one example. In the early 1990s, Walsh, then cohost of Pat Robertson's 700 Club, was one of the country's most familiar and beloved Christian celebrities. But in 1992 she stepped down from the program and later received inpatient treatment at a psychiatric hospital. Since then, she has been divorced, remarried, and now has a one-year-old child. Walsh, author of Honestly, says of her spiritual journey, "I felt that I buried my face in the mane of the Lion of Judah."

Walsh says the Women of Faith movement is "like a community of broken people." She adds, "The purpose of opening a wound is for healing, but you need to open a wound first. It's only through facing what's true that people can be healed." Since her recovery, Walsh has found herself in demand as a conference speaker.

"A lot of the Joyful Journey experience reminds me of the story of The Wizard of Oz," says Walsh. "The lion found courage, but he couldn't have done so by himself, not one of them could have. It was because they went together that they could do it."

Another major ingredient in the new movement asks women to move beyond overcoming past adversity to grasping future opportunity. Thelma Wells, author of Bumblebees Fly Anyway (Kendall-Hunt, 1997), tells of her struggles with racism, physical assaults, and emotional abuse. Wells, an African American, says she wears a bumblebee brooch on her shoulder as a constant reminder that the bumblebee flies in spite of its shape. She says

Mentoring and Modeling Great Aspirations

"You older women of Christ, there is a generation of women out there longing to walk beside you," Southern Baptist author and speaker Esther Burroughs said at the inaugural Aspiring Women conference in February. "Mentoring is not about cloning, but about helping women become like Jesus."

Burroughs, 61, defines mentoring as "sharing the seeds of God's impact in your life journey" with younger women.

Women mentoring one another is becoming a significant ministry goal among the leaders of the women's spiritual-development conferences.

In February, about 2,000 women gathered at Calvary Church in Dallas for the first Aspiring Women conference. Organizers billed the conference as "an opportunity for you and your friends to get away from the demands of home, family, and work to a place where you can sit at the feet of Jesus."

Burroughs and others are concerned about the separation of families and the lack of contact between generations. "We no longer have the luxury of being raised by an extended family," Burroughs writes in A Garden Path to Mentoring: Planting Your Life in Another and Releasing the Fragrance of Christ (New Hope, 1997).

Burroughs told CT she believes that "the Lord is looking for women to get out of the church" and into the world for ministry. She hopes to encourage women to "become all that God wants them to be."

Generation X is looking for "an authentic, live, show-me, love-me, walk-with-me, and guide-me person," according to Burroughs. Some women in their twenties who visit church have no clue where or how to buy a Bible. But they want to know because they see peers underlining or highlighting words of Scripture.

"The women of the nineties are saying, we want mentors," says Aspire magazine editor Jeanette Thomason. "I think this partly explains the rise of the [women's] conferences. Women are seeking relationships with other women to find their own way as Christians."

Seed planter: Burroughs.

By Mary Cagney in Dallas.

Christian women should "defy the odds" just as bumblebees do. Wells develops several themes in her messages, including "the power of choice" and "in Christ you can be the best you can be."

Also, Wells points women toward Scripture. She recalls an e-mail message from a woman who complained of verbal abuse by her pastor. The woman found the strength to confront the minister in part because of her study of Psalm 27.

Despite much emphasis on women's problems, conference leaders use humor to lighten the mood of the meetings. Speeches are peppered with references to mammograms and estrogen pills. Barbara Johnson, who has sold more than 2 million books, says she offers comments "about dieting, middle age, motherhood, husbands, wrinkles, love—all those hot spots in a woman's life that would kill us if we let them get us down."

Laughter and joy are the main courses in a menu spiced with what Eastern College scholar Mary Stewart Van Leeuwen calls "gynecological humor." "I suspect they're trying to send a message to men: Girls just want to have fun," says Van Leeuwen.

Women come away from conferences feeling replenished and hopeful. Walsh found a note on her seat at a San Antonio conference from a woman whose husband has been abusive, saying, "Thank you for the hope I got last night."

The conferences also are designed to envelop the women attendees with a sense of intimacy and community. "When they see 20,000 other women, they realize emotionally that they are not alone," Renewing the Heart's Harper says.

One byproduct of the conferences has been a renewed interest in mentoring programs for women (See "Mentoring and Modeling Great Aspirations," left). "We have an eight-week training course for mentors, and I can hardly keep mentors trained to meet the need," says Patti Pierce, president of Women at the Well of Menlo Park, California. "There's not a lot of nurturing in relationships anymore. We have to create them."

THE DEATH OF SISTERHOOD: As American social structures have changed, women have found themselves without the traditional networks for nurture and support that had been available to women of past generations.

Pat Clary, president and founder of Pasadena, California-based Women's Ministries Institute, which has developed women's studies programs for Christian schools, says today's Christian women experience more isolation and loneliness.

"They're removed from their family," Clary says. "They can't get to know their neighbors. It's difficult to establish relationships if they're in a fast-paced life-style." Harper says, "It's not like 50 years ago when they could go and chat with a neighbor over a cup of coffee. Not connecting is an urgent issue for them."

A woman's place at home, at work, or at church continues to evolve. As women juggle their roles of mother, wife, and employee, more are confused and disoriented. In 1993, researcher Miriam Neff surveyed 1,000 evangelical women and found that fewer than four in ten full-time working women with children felt affirmed by their pastor or by church members for their decision to work.

"The church is meeting the needs of women in more traditional roles," says Women at the Well's Pierce. "Women who are trying to balance marriage, family, and work have very little time to go to the traditional program in the church."

Christian women in the work force today do not have as much time to attend church as their counterparts a generation or two ago. Some congregations now have evening Bible studies for women and have adjusted. But weekend gatherings such as the Joyful Journey conferences provide a welcome break from everyday chores, combined with spiritual nourishment.

AVOIDING AGENDAS? Few issues are as hotly debated by evangelicals as the issue of wifely submission to husbands and its implications for women in leadership positions. However, the Joyful Journey and Aspiring Women conferences do not take an explicit stand on whether the Bible prohibits women in church leadership.

Women of Faith's Arterburn says, "We don't have a political or spiritual agenda. Women who come respond to the truth presented with grace. As a result, women are more motivated to grow in their relationship with the Lord."

Researcher Neff says, "Women are in very different places on these issues. If they talked more about these issues they would attract a lot of criticism, and there wouldn't be as big a group gathering." Yet, Concerned Women for America (CWA), the nation's largest women's organization, which frequently takes stands on public-policy issues, remains supportive of the women's conferences. "It appears that these conferences are endorsing traditional family values, and CWA applauds their efforts," says Carmen Pate, president of the organization.

However, Christians for Biblical Equality founder Catherine Kroeger believes that women's conferences should do more. "Domestic violence is the premier health problem for women," Kroeger says. "I'm concerned that when we have a humorous problem in our midst, we are denying it." For Ruth Haley Barton, author of Equal to the Task: Men and Women in Partnership (InterVarsity Press, 1998), greater attention should be placed on practical concerns, such as developing better communication skills. "There are whole new sets of skills and disciplines that we need to work with," she says. "Men and women have different communication styles. How might we transform our world if men and women deeply honored each other as equal reflections of God's image?"

WHERE'S THE ACTIVISM? The new women's movement stands in contrast to historic women's movements. Christian women led the way in fighting slavery and championing temperance and women's suffrage. "Any big movement of people can have social and political effects, whether intended or not," says Miriam Adeney, a professor at Seattle Pacific University and at Regent College in Vancouver, British Columbia. "I wonder, however, if these conferences are really facing the hard issues of corporate community life," she says. "Is there anything comparable to the realism of Christian women that spawned the Women's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU) a century and a half ago?"

The WCTU, led by Frances Willard, had 2 million members worldwide a century ago. Willard made a decision to focus on political means, such as women's right to vote, in order to achieve anti-alcohol goals. She persuaded many Christian women to support women's suffrage as a "weapon of protection to her home and tempted loved ones from the tyranny of drink." WCTU also helped start kindergartens, enact child labor laws, and establish the first daycare centers for the children of working women in the 1870s.

In the fight against slavery, Christian women formed the Philadelphia Female Anti-Slavery Society in 1833. They made worship services with hymns and prayers an important feature of their work. Members spoke to more than 40,000 people.

Researchers are studying the shift in political and social activism among evangelical women during the past 100 years. Historian Margaret Bendroth, director of the Women and Twentieth Century Protestantism project financed by Pew Charitable Trusts, says that because there are "more options open to women today," few of them may "want to run a missionary society." The women's conferences could potentially be harnessed for tremendous social change. The litany for the opening ceremony of the World Conference of Women in 1895 challenged Christian women to honor their forerunners. "For the women who have gone before us . . . for their vision of the wrong of all distinction because of color, creed, or sex, their righteous anger against all oppression of the weak and exploitation of the helpless. . . . We praise thee, O God."

LASTING IMPACT: What will be the lasting impact of these women's conferences? Some leaders believe the women's conferences could have an enduring role not only in meeting specific needs of women, but also in energizing and equipping women for ministry.

Last year, Karen Paparelli, a wife and mother of three young children, attended a women's conference, which she calls "the catalyst that set me sailing." Within weeks of the conference, she says, "God pulled me out of the church and put me into the world." She organized the local March for Jesus event and has been writing a newspaper column from a Christian perspective.

"Women's ministries can really be dynamic for evangelizing and nurturing younger women," says H. B. London, vice president of pastoral ministries for Focus on the Family. "It has the potential of being a great area of evangelism for the local church."

Campus Crusade for Christ, through its organization Women Today International, is equipping women who attend the Women of Faith conferences to evangelize their neighborhoods.

After the conference, a Women Today International staff member is linked with a women's ministry leader to help her train women in evangelism. Time Out conferences are in the process of creating a four-week curriculum for churches to use in discipling women who make a first-time commitment to the Lord at their conferences. Of the new women's conferences, only Time Out has plans to offer leadership training to Christian women.

Perhaps the greatest potential of the conferences will be in encouraging and strengthening women in their personal relationship with Jesus Christ. Debbie Nixon of San Diego learned she had breast cancer just before she went to a women's gathering in Anaheim, California, last September. The conference, Nixon says, "reminded me of God and that I wasn't alone going through this. That was what I needed to hear."

So I'm Sorry Already

On the old Bob Newhart Show, the one that cast Bob as a psychiatrist, one regular character carried meekness to a fault. He was a failure as a door-to-door salesman because he feared knocking on people's doors might disturb them. So he'd wait on the doorstep, hoping they'd happen to open the door.

One day this fretful character bustled into Bob's office muttering, "I'm sorry I'm late."

"You're not late," said Bob.

"Well then, I'm sorry I'm early," he replied.

"You're not early, either," Bob told him.

"I'm sorry," he sighed.

I was reminded of this apologetic character by the recurrent waves of apology sweeping over the country: whites apologizing to blacks, Catholics apologizing to Jews, Promise Keepers apologizing to everybody. In some cases there are good reasons for apologizing, and it's a necessary first step. But what's the second step? You can't go on being sorry forever, unless you want to wind up on a psychiatrist's couch. What's supposed to happen after repentance?

Of course, the prior question is whether we're dealing with true repentance at all; in some cases, the popular device of formal apology might only be a token paid to blunt criticism. It sounds like, "I'm sorry," but it means, "I said I was sorry." Thus at one end of the apology spectrum are those who intend to do nothing more than say the magic words. It's a get-out-of-jail-free card—sometimes literally. Men of public stature caught using funds or women in questionable ways often use this ploy.

Then there's the apology that takes a diplomatic tone, where one group makes a formal statement to another regarding wrongs in history. I imagine that these statements are made when the apologizers feel crushed by the guilt of yesteryear and search for a way to alleviate it. I suspect it doesn't work; such an apology can't alleviate guilt, because the apologiz-ers are not the ones who did the wrong. Departed ancestors can't participate in the repentance or the forgiveness; the past is stubbornly unchangeable. It constitutes a psychodrama in which players have assumed roles they are unable to discharge.

Thus historical apologies deliver a measure of frustration. Additionally, they can derail genuine progress. The passage of time has already accomplished some healing, as demonstrated by the appearance of a desire to make apology. Treating past division as if it were still in full force uproots naturally growing unity, insidiously suggesting that it's always us-versus-them, forever and ever, amen.

The recent events most resembling biblical repentance are the waves of revival at churches and colleges, and at the Promise Keepers rallies. Hundreds of thousands of men weeping for their sins is a bracing image, yet I wonder if our PK brothers will ever be allowed to say anything beyond "I'm sorry." Systematic denigration of men has left them with little other role.

So what do you say after you say "I'm sorry"? You get on with your life and make changes. As Bob Beckel, cohost of CNN's Crossfire Sunday, asked feminist Eleanor Smeal, "If 10,000 of them become better husbands, better providers . . . what's wrong with that?" The Hebrew word for repentance, shub, means turning your life around 180 degrees. After apology comes change.

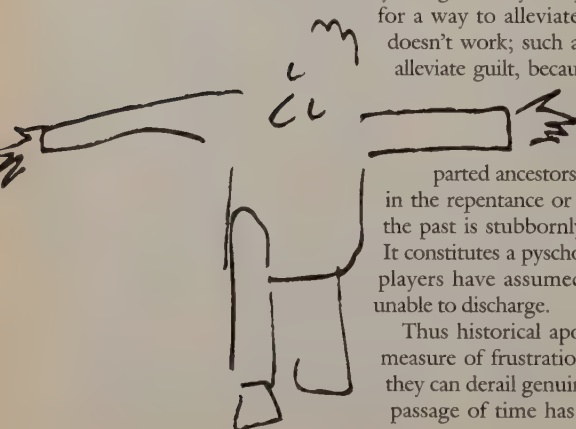

I once heard an overenthusiastic retreat leader proclaim, "Repentance means we turn around 360 degrees!" Of course, in some cases, we do; then we repent again. Even the publican in the temple, heart-felt as his repentance was, may not have walked out the door and into a pristine life. He may have only partly understood the changes God was requiring of him; he may have even failed, initially, at those he did attempt.

The shocking news of the gospel is that we can always be forgiven. God desires "I'm sorry" more than "I did it," contrition more than confession. We cart the broken heap of self into the repair shop and beg for mercy and strength, knowing this is what he loves. "A broken and a contrite heart . . . you will not despise" (Ps. 51:17, NIV).

Broken and contrite hearts have been showing up in odd places lately, not necessarily where the faith journey is complete. Author and Salon digizine columnist Anne Lamott holds the usual raft of liberal opinions, yet she is vocally sold out to Jesus, grateful to the church that welcomed her when she was unwed, pregnant, and recovering from substance abuse. Her faith mystifies her family, friends, and even herself. She writes of looking at an image of Christ crucified: "I believe in it, and it's so nuts. How did some fabulously cerebral and black-humored cynic like myself come . . . to believe as much as I believe in gravity or the size of space that Jesus paid a debt he didn't owe because we had a debt we couldn't pay?"

"I'm sorry." It's a good place for understanding to start.

HIGHLIGHTS: LEADERSHIP

Naked Preachers Are Distracting

It's hip to "tell all" nowadays. But is it wise? Not really, argues William H. Willimon in this article reprinted from LEADERSHIP, a sister publication of CHRISTIANITY TODAY. While the essay addresses mainly preachers, it also makes good eavesdropping for those who listen to sermons. Willimon is dean of the chapel and professor of Christian ministry at Duke University in Durham, North Carolina.

Authenticity is more than a matter of being who I am; it is a matter of being who God calls me to be.

I take as my text a statement by the great theologian Oscar Wilde: "About the worst advice you can give anybody is, 'Be yourself.'" For clergy, that aphorism may be especially true.

Recently I heard a church-growth consultant urge pastors to "be authentic." He noted that boomers, busters, and GenX-ers all like preachers who "share themselves," who peel off the clerical masks and share their humanity. "If you've had a tough week, tell them," he advised. "If you have trouble believing a certain piece of Scripture, tell them."

Authenticity is a great virtue. The insincere ministerial demeanor is a true turnoff for many. The congregation rightly expects us not to talk the talk unless we walk the walk. And perhaps there was a time when we preachers needed to demonstrate to the congregation that, despite the M.Div., the backward collar, or the red rose on the lapel, we were, after all, just poor struggling sinners like them.

I wonder, though, if that day has passed. Lately, there have been so many opportunities for the laity to utter the truism "Well, we must remember that pastors are only human" that I see little need for us intentionally to share ourselves, expose ourselves, strip down, open up, or let it all hang out in the name of "authenticity." Show me a layperson who needs us to expend time in Sunday worship convincing folks that we preachers are, after all, only human, and I'll show you a layperson who has been neglecting the gossip section of the local newspaper.

Have you ever decided to act authentically? That's as dumb as deciding to act humbly. You either are or you aren't. To intentionally pepper my sermon with doses of predetermined authenticity is to be, well, inauthentic.

An elderly woman complained to me that she could tell when her pastor had not had time to prepare a sermon, because he would begin crying at the weakest point in the sermon. "Crying?" I asked.

"Yeah, crying," she said. "He says something like, 'When I think of what Jesus did for us I just, well, I . . . I . . . forgive me, I'm just overcome with gratitude.'"

He usually is overcome with gratitude about once every month, usually related to his fishing schedule."

We need more of that? I'm all for pastoral honesty, to let the people know we stand among them as a redeemed sinner who struggles. But the sermon may not be the best place for such sharing. There, we have our hands full proclaiming the gospel, pointing to Christ, telling the story; there may not be much time to waste pointing to ourselves, sharing our story. John Wesley loved to counter his preachers' tales of how well they had done in the pulpit by asking them, "But did you offer Christ?"

I must never become confused into thinking that people are in church because of me. True, we preach through our personality. When a colleague and I edited an encyclopedia of preaching, we noted that the most-quoted phrase was Phillips Brooks's classic definition of preaching as "truth communicated through personality." We have got the personality thing down fairly well. It's the truth thing that may be in peril.

Some time ago, when we preachers were first being urged to "share your story" and to lay ourselves bare before the people, I heard a sermon that began, "Prayer is a problem for me." From there the preacher went on about his doubts and dilemmas with prayer. I thought it refreshingly honest.

On the way home from church, my wife said, "I suppose there was a time when a congregation would be shocked, or at least titillated, by having a pastor admit that he was inept at prayer. Nowadays, it might be more exciting to hear a pastor stand and say, 'I may have problems with prayer, but thank God we Christians have resources greater than my limited experience.' Then he could have quoted Paul or Teresa of Avila or someone who knew more than he did."

In a society where the emotional striptease is the standard stuff of daytime television, in a culture where we are encouraged relentlessly to scan our egos as if there is no help for us other than that which is self-derived, do we preachers need to be "authentic"? Authenticity is more than a matter of being who I am; it is a matter of being who God calls me to be. For preachers, authenticity means being true, not just to our feelings, but true to our vocation, true to God's call. We serve God's people by laying aside ourselves and taking up the cross and preaching Christ and him crucified, whether we feel like it next Sunday or not. CT

Hollywood's Renegade Apostle

Randall Balmer

Several years ago an editor for the Des Moines Register asked me to review Martin Scorsese's film The Last Temptation of Christ, then the target of vigorous boycotts by conservative Christians. As I stood in a long queue outside the theater in midtown Manhattan, I witnessed all manner of demonstrations and endured numerous insults from the "good Christian folks" who did not want me to see the movie. As an evangelical Christian, I can attest that nothing I saw inside the theater frightened me nearly so much as what I had seen outside.

The Last Temptation of Christ eventually collapsed beneath the weight of its own pretensions (not to mention the abysmal, clench-jawed performance of Willem Dafoe in the title role), but the Religious Right has continued its desultory assault on Hollywood. And why not? The motion picture industry presents a broad target, from the mindless patter of Saturday Night Fever and Spice World to the ritual violence of Arnold Schwarzenegger, Sylvester Stallone, and Chuck Norris. Religious conservatives have become adept at sniffing out assaults on "traditional family values," even in the house of Disney.

Occasionally, however, filmmakers get it right, producing motion pictures that are morally uplifting and even theologically astute. Two recent examples are The Spitfire Grill, released in 1996, and The Apostle, just released by October Films.

The Spitfire Grill, which won an award from the Sundance Film Festival, is the story of Perchance "Percy" Talbott, recently released from the penitentiary after serving time for manslaughter, who seeks to build a new life in Gilead, Maine. Predictably, Percy's presence arouses the suspicions of townspeople, and viewers should pay special attention to the biblical character and place names. The story is rich in symbolism and sacramental theology—the hand of anointing, a loaf of bread, a jug of apple jack, the raging waters of the local river—and it offers a clear and unambiguous parable of grace and redemption.

The Apostle, written, produced, and directed by Robert Duvall, who also stars in the title role, lacks the symbolic richness and the theological sophistication of The Spitfire Grill, but it is an authentic portrayal of a Pentecostal-holiness preacher, Euliss (Sonny) Dewey—authentic, but not typical. When Sonny discovers his wife's infidelity and learns that she has also seized control of his congregation and limited access to their children, he erupts in a jealous rage against the boyfriend. "I think he might be on the road to glory this time," Sonny says to a friend as he skips town.

Sonny adopts a new identity and, in time-honored evangelical fashion, begins his own church in the relative obscurity of Bayou Boutte, Louisiana. He lures Brother Blackwell, an African-American preacher played superbly by John Beasley, out of retirement, and refurbishes an old bus, which he uses to carry folks to the church building he has fixed up on the edge of town. "I tell you what," Brother Blackwell says when Sonny first approaches him about his proposed venture, "I'm going to keep my eye on you. And the Lord keep his eye on both of us. And we all three keep an eye out for the Devil."

The refurbished bus and church building serve as metaphors for conversion, and there are conversions aplenty in The Apostle. God still fashions a silk purse out of a sow's ear; witness the life of Sonny Dewey himself, who has adopted the moniker "the Apostle E. F." for his career in Louisiana. "My knees are worn out," Sonny's estranged wife declares at one point. The movie leaves little doubt that, despite his flaws, Sonny is a man of faith and a man of prayer, and both are put to the test when local rednecks, who object to the interracial character of the congregation, threaten to destroy the church.

Janet Maslin of the New York Times describes The Apostle as a "rare display of spiritual light on screen" and "a film that can create a full, fiery, warts-and-all portrait of Sonny without reducing him to any kind of stereotype." The worship scenes alone make the movie worthwhile—the singing, the testimonies, the preaching, the conversions—which Duvall directs sparingly, even lovingly. There is a sweetness to this portrayal of holiness faith in the South.

Duvall, reared a Methodist, spent 13 years and $5 million of his own money getting this picture produced. Duvall's tenacity and his theological sensitivity by now should have attracted the attention of those who crusaded against The Last Temptation of Christ—and the evangelical community at large.

Unless films like The Apostle succeed, other worthy motion pictures stand little chance of being produced. That leaves us only with the drivel of violence and sex and vacuousness that Hollywood regularly purveys. I would hope that the mailing-list muscle that conservative Christians regularly flex as an opposition force could be exercised here for more positive ends. CI

A Literary God

The novelist as lapsed Calvinist.

God and the American Writer

Alfred Kazin

God and the American Writer, by Alfred Kazin
(Alfred A. Knopf, 259 pp.; $25, hardcover).
Reviewed by David Lyle Jeffrey.

Among the intellectual leaders of American society a deeply personal belief in God is tolerated as harmlessly personal, like a taste in food or a loyalty to the Red Sox. Religion even among the faithful, like American literature today, has left cosmology to the physicists. Nobody argues about God today. It is enough for the complacent that Americans go to church and synagogue in record numbers.

With these acerbic words, Alfred Kazin identifies a contemporary spiritual vacuity that troubles him even more than the ranting showmanship of "a politicized, intolerant, and paranoid religion," with its "aims to coerce the rest of us." But it is more the spiritual aridity of American religion today, religion that doesn't matter enough, than an academic interest in literary history of the United States that prompts God and the American Writer.

Alfred Kazin is now 82 years of age. With a distinguished teaching career at a number of colleges and universities (including Harvard) and, since On Native Grounds (1942), more than 20 volumes of superior criticism, literary history, and personal reflection to his credit, he is deservedly regarded as a doyen to American literary criticism. In God and the American Writer, much that has occupied him throughout his career is brought together in a kind of grand summation. Hawthorne, Emerson, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Melville, Whitman, Lincoln, Dickinson, William James, Twain, T. S. Eliot, Frost, and Faulkner each receives a full chapter, but the text is interwoven throughout with a great many more authors of merit, from Thoreau to Toni Morrison. In all of these writers it is not their profession of belief—or unbelief—that obtains Kazin's attention. It is rather their imaginative characterizing of the role of religion in American culture.

American religion has always seemed a conundrum to those on the outside looking in. On the one hand, there is the famous insistence of the First Amendment prohibiting the "establishment of religion." On the other hand, there is the fact that from the televangelists to presidential reflections on "the State of the Union," no modern country seems more publicly religious. Religion appears to be as politicized in the United States as in many Renaissance nation-states, yet no general denominational coherence commands or unifies this interest. Margaret Atwood's specter of a horrendous dystopia of the Religious Right in her novel The Handmaid's Tale insightfully characterizes an oppressive regime as pseudobiblical but effectively antifaith, overtly annihilating Southern Baptists, Quakers, Jews, believing Catholics, and evangelical African Americans. Kazin never mentions Atwood, but his dragons and hers bear a close resemblance to one another.

The evolution of Puritan hyper-Calvinism in America, intensifying the characteristic Protestant tendency to incremental fragmentation or to materialist and self-actualizing secularism, has in practice made "the self-sufficiency of the individual the key to all things identifiably American." As a generalization, this is hard to refute. If lapsed Catholics tend, at least in literature, to fuzzy left-liberal politics or extremes of carnal dissolution, lapsed Calvinists, at least among American writers, tend more alarmingly to self-deification and raw appetitiveness for material success.

Emerson, whose doctrine begins with unshakable confidence in "the infinitude of the private mind," illustrates one post-Calvinist track. He ends in adulation of Napoleon as "a man not embarrassed by any scruples; compact, instant, selfish, prudent, and of a perception which did not suffer itself to be balked or misled by any pretenses of others"—fit for a captain of industry. Democracy was largely an abstraction for the ex-theologian Emerson. As a public lecturer he notably scorned to take a question from his audiences. In matters of religious reflection he relegated Jesus to a pretext for recognizing God in himself: "Obey thyself" became his maxim, while to imitate Jesus, he thought, was to engage in servile redundancy. Accordingly, as Kazin has it, "he became a prophet not of God in every American heart but of rugged individualism. Any American can become just about anything he likes."

Herman Melville's Moby Dick contains over one thousand references to the Bible, but Melville, too, was in rebellion against Calvinism, specifically the

ROCKWELL KENT

Dutch Reformed Church of his parents. Like many a lapsed Calvinist, Melville was morbidly apprehensive that the grace and election he had forfeited might prove real after all. Unliberated by his negative choice, he lived his life in a spiritual no man's land. When in his famous quarrel with God he construes his adversary as alter ego and rival, for Kazin his "radical individualism was [squarely] in the American vein and spoke for more writers than he would ever know." Like Mark Twain, Melville was "a Calvinist whose theology survived his faith"; like Faulkner, he was "a Calvinist without religion." What all of them carry away from the ruins of their religion is a deep uncertainty that man's destiny is really in his own hands and a powerful anger that it cannot convincingly be made to seem so.

Walt Whitman, raised among Quakers, seems to Kazin another post-Calvinist, though his track leads not so frequently to the boardroom as to more private places. Whitman is perhaps the consummate American individualist, "worshipping the power of sex," while in matters religious he "never had as much interest in 'God' as he did in replacing conventional religion with himself as all-seeing poet." It is no shy fellow who becomes prophet to his own Advent, and who can say in triumphant self-assurance, "The priest departs; the divine literatus comes" (Democratic Vistas).

Whitman's most adoring nineteenth-century biographer, Richard M. Bucke, was a Canadian. Bucke believed Leaves of Grass to herald a new religious era: "What the Vedas were to Brahmanism, the Law and the Prophets to Judaism, the Avesta and Zend to Zoroastrianism, the Kings to Confucianism and Taoism, the Pitakas to Buddhism, the Quran to Mohammedanism, will Leaves of Grass be to the future of American civilization." Alas, implies the weary Kazin, Bucke may have been too prescient. Even in England, adherents to Whitman's cult met weekly to read his poems aloud—he had become not only a legend in his own time but founder of a kind of "church."

Kazin finds hypocrisy and self-serving almost everywhere in "American Religion"; he adopts no such triumphalist Emersonian sympathies as does Harold Bloom (in his 1992 book of that title). Yet he struggles to be fair. It does not please him that Jefferson owned slaves and "thought little of the blacks as a race," or that T. S. Eliot was an anti-Semite, but he is at pains to enter these matters into the record even as he states his admiration for much of what each man wrote. His unalloyed concern, however, is that their contradiction of professed faith should be so characteristic of a larger literary culture.

Happily, Kazin takes time to praise exceptions. Harriet Beecher Stowe, whose Uncle Tom's Cabin has been derided by twentieth-century critics, he cites as a writer far more consistent than her critics. The idea for her book came to her while sitting in church, but it was conceived as a protest against the church, whose sophistical evasions in the matter of slavery remain an ugly embarrassment to this day. Nor is she a singular sign of contradiction: in the middle of the Civil War, Episcopalian diarist George Templeton Strong excoriated the silent complicity of his own denomination:

The church in which I was brought up, which I have maintained so long to be the highest and noblest of organizations, refuses to say one word for the country at this crisis. Her priests call on Almighty God every day, in the most solemn offices at her liturgy, to deliver His people from "false doctrine, heresy and schism," from "sedition, privy conspiracy and rebellion." Now at last, when they and their people are confronted by the most wicked of rebellions and the most wicked schisms on the vilest of grounds, the constitutional right to breed black babies for sale, when rebellion and schism are arrayed against the church and against society in the unloveliest form they can possibly assume—the church is afraid to speak. How would she get on were there a large, highly respectable minority sympathizing with adultery, or homicide, or larceny?

Well, we are beginning to realize that Strong's question is no longer rhetorical, and that the answer often given is unflattering to many churches.

Uncle Tom's Cabin, the largest-selling American book in the nineteenth century after the Bible itself (and almost as popular in Great Britain and Canada), had in fact a direct effect upon the Emancipation Act, as Lincoln himself attested, by mobilizing ordinary Christians to reject what their denominational officials tolerated. Bearing in itself "the truth of Scripture," Uncle Tom's Cabin became what Kazin is pleased to call "New England's lost holiness." While some might think that remark too broad, it is consistent with late reevaluations of the importance of Beecher Stowe's protest as a more authentic representation of nineteenth-century American Christianity than most (cf. Manfred Siebald). Also, it echoes reevaluation of the positive role of evangelical Christianity in the African-American community itself. Kazin cites Toni Morrison (Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination), who credits the love preached by Christianity with "having saved the slave so far as anything could." But have the mainstream churches, as churches, grown more toward this type of "basic Christianity" or toward versions of the gospel according to Emerson? The story is complex.

Kazin's own stance is secular: "living side by side with religion as part of our inheritance in America, our sense that life is never simply circumstantial does not mean that we have to believe." Yet he admires writers who have creditable belief (such as the Catholics Walker Percy and Flannery O'Connor) and is even more generous toward churches repentant of past transgressions (e.g., on slavery). Though himself a Jew, he praises the Southern Baptists in particular—"Unlike a lot of other white churches, the Southerners did not deal in pale, abstract words heard only on a Sunday"—and he celebrates the spiritual realism of many African-American churches.

His judgment is that the American writer is now, unfortunately, typically uninterested in religion of any stripe, authentic or inauthentic. What persists of the legacy of a decayed Calvinism is only a radical individualism devoid of self-transcending belief. Alas, he notes, "Where genuine belief is lacking, 'religion' as a social experience fills the bill." But such religion can do little to inspire, positively or negatively, great literature. In an America that, "despite its high rate of church observance, is a particularly secular culture," language itself suffers. Kazin finds "the mechanistic and even commercial vocabulary in which, more than ever, Americans talk and write," disturbing proof of the decay of salt and light, or its displacement by an "endless whimpering of 'feeling religious' without inner content."

One might easily think that Kazin goes too far, that the reality cannot be so dark as the picture he paints. And, to be sure, there are accents of an aged and disappointed partisan in this book: he repeats himself occasionally, and his penchant for aphorism and impatience for compromise leads him to overstatement. Hart Crane was surely in no plausible sense "last of the true believers," and one wishes Kazin's anthology of American writers might have included Wendell Berry, Richard Wilbur, Chaim Potok, and Howard Nemerov among others, as well as more place for O'Connor and Percy. But Kazin's articulate anguish warrants careful thought. Can we deny him entirely when he concludes:

Starting from embattled lonely beginnings, each church in America was separate from and doctrinally hostile to others. The individual on his way to becoming a writer was all too conscious that it was his ancestral sect, his early training, his own holiness in the eyes of his church that he brought to his writing. He became its apostle without having forever to believe in it, in anything—except the unlimited freedom that is the usual American faith.

It would be hard to find a more accurate—or more properly troubling—precis of American religious history as it bears upon American literature. C

Real Sex

Making the case for fidelity.

For Fidelity: How Intimacy and Commitment Enrich Our Lives, by Catherine M. Wallace (Alfred A. Knopf, 172 pp.; $22, hardcover). Reviewed by John Wilson.

The uncanny timing of the movie Wag the Dog, which was released just before the Monica Lewinsky scandal broke, occasioned a good deal of comment. (The New Yorker summarizes the film thus: "President, in closing weeks of reelection campaign, succumbs to zipper problem; spin doctor, to divert attention, simulates war with Albania.") There must also have been some discreet celebration in the halls of Alfred A. Knopf at the timing of For Fidelity: How Intimacy and Commitment Enrich Our Lives, published at the end of February. If you are dissatisfied with editorials and columns and other vehicles for hit-and-run punditry, you will find in Wallace's book a thoughtful and thought-provoking argument for sexual fidelity.

A onetime professor of English at Northwestern University with a specialty in literary theory, Wallace—as the flap copy informs us—"set aside her scholarly career . . . to stay home full-time with newborn twins and a two-year-old, all three of whom are now in high school." In addition to full-time child-rearing, she has obviously continued to read omnivorously; her case for fidelity draws on sources as various as the poet Samuel Taylor Coleridge and the philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre, as well as on her own experience as a young girl, a teenager, and a wife and mother, all set in the context of her strong Christian faith.

It is a shame, then, that very early on, Wallace makes a move that immediately narrows her audience. In the first chapter, right after she affirms that "sexual fidelity is a practice intrinsic to the happiness of a happy marriage," Wallace pauses and addresses the reader thus:

Before we go any further, however, let me answer a question that I suppose is on every reader's mind by this point. What about gays and lesbians? Specifically, what about gays or lesbians, sexual fidelity, and marriage? Do I use the term "marriage" in some exclusive sense?

Actually that question wasn't in my mind, at least, until Wallace raised it. She goes on to say that no, she doesn't use the term "marriage" in "some exclusive sense" (by "exclusive," she means the sense in which the term has always been used), and yes, her argument for fidelity applies equally to homosexuals. The way she characterizes those who disagree with her—those who believe that homosexual unions are clearly condemned by Scripture—is highly tendentious and seems calculated to drive such readers away.

Similarly, in a later chapter, Wallace's facile dismissal of Catholicism ("I left the Roman Catholic church after a copy of Ehrlich and Ehrlich, Population, Resources, Environment: Issues in Human Ecology made its way from hand to hand in my undergraduate Jesuit college") seems designed both to discourage Catholics from reading further and, more important, to curry favor with the same audience who would applaud her view of homosexuality.

These gestures are at odds with Wallace's routine mode of operation, which is anything but facile. Indeed, it would be a pity if readers who disagree with Wallace about homosexuality simply stopped reading her book—just as it would if gay and lesbian readers refused to attend to Wallace's case for fidelity.

It is rare indeed to find a book about sexuality that is neither sleazy nor clinical, neither saccharine nor joyless. And a Christian sex book, too, that you wouldn't be embarrassed to be caught with. For Fidelity is such a book: worth reading, worth arguing about, worth reading again—even if it is warmly endorsed by the Right Reverend John Shelby Spong. C

EXCERPT

"Does Daddy use condoms?"

I stopped grinding coffee beans and looked across the dark, November-morning kitchen at my eight-year-old son, who had set aside his raisin toast with peanut butter. The kitchen smelled of cinnamon and peanuts and coffee.

"Mark says—Mark says the teacher says if you don't use condoms then you could both get sick and die. So we want to know. Does he? Every time?"

I looked down from that level, blue-eyed gaze, wishing I could eat coffee beans like peanuts, straight from the little bag. Apparently Mark had been talking to his brother about his fifth-grade "sex ed" course, sharing his fears about orphanages in their endless brotherly small talk after lights out. When a kid has totally uncool parents, when his parents were probably nerds when they were kids, a kid needs to ask these questions. A kid can't count on parents like that to know the important stuff—not even when Daddy is a professor in the medical school downtown.

REFLECTIONS

Classic and contemporary excerpts

It Was Called Resurrection

Whatever it was that occurred after Jesus' crucifixion, one thing is absolutely clear: It was called "resurrection." Of that there can be no doubt. All who were met by it called it the same thing. However unclear many things may be about alleged meetings with Jesus after his death, there was a consensus in the community that whatever it was that people were experiencing, the correct term for it was resurrection.

This meant that they had experienced and tasted the first fruits of the expected event at the end time of judgment and redemption.

—Thomas C. Oden in

Agenda for Theology After Modernity . . . What?

Aslan's Resurrection

"Oh, you're real, you're real! Oh, Aslan!" cried Lucy and both girls flung themselves upon him and covered him with kisses.

"But what does it all mean?" asked Susan when they were somewhat calmer.

"It means," said Aslan, "that though the Witch knew the Deep Magic, there is a magic deeper still which she did not know. Her knowledge goes back only to the dawn of Time. But if she could have looked a little further back, into the stillness and the darkness before Time dawned, she would have read there a different incantation. She would have known that when a willing victim who had committed no treachery was killed in a traitor's stead, the Table would crack and Death itself would start working backwards.

—C. S. Lewis in The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobe

The Only Road to Easter

Lord, I believe, but help thou my unbelief, because I still do not want to die. I believe Jesus has power to raise the dead, only I do not want him practicing on me. I want a God who will cut my losses and cushion my failures, a God who will grant me a life free from pain. I want a God who will rescue me from death, who will delete it from the human experience and find another way to operate.

What I, what all of us, have instead is a God who resurrects us from the dead,

Easter Wings

Lord, Who createdst man in wealth and store,
Though foolishly he lost the same
Decaying more and more Till he became
Most poor:
With Thee
O let me rise
As larks, harmoniously,
And sing this day Thy victories:
Then shall the fall further the flight in me.

My tender age in sorrow did begin;
And still with sicknesses and shame

Thou didst so punish sin,

That I became

Most thin.

With Thee

Let me combine

And feel this day Thy victory;

For, if I imp my wing on Thine,
Affliction shall advance the flight in me.

—George Herbert in

The Country of the Risen King

Death Destroyed

Our generation has never seen a man crucified in sugary religious art; but it was not a sweet sight, and few of us would dare to have a real picture of a crucifixion on our bedroom walls. A crucified slave beside the Roman road screamed until his voice died and then hung, a filthy, festering clot of flies, sometimes for days—a living man whose hands and feet were swollen masses of gangrenous meat. That is what our Lord took upon himself, "that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage."

—Joy Davidman in

Smoke on the Mountain

He Rose for Us

His resurrection was all for others. That miracle was wrought in him, not for him.

—George MacDonald in

A Cure for Spiritual Deafness

Once thought of hermits as shaggy recluses notable mainly for their self-obsession and dearth of social skills—people like the Unabomber. Thomas Merton corrected my misconception. “To be really mad, you need other people,” he explained. “When you are by yourself you soon get tired of your craziness. It is too exhausting.”

A recent book by Peter France, Hermits, has helped to fill in the picture. France gave up a high-profile career with the BBC to lead a contemplative life on a Greek island. He did so not as an act of sacrifice, rather as a quest for the wisdom available only through a life of solitude. Living apart from the press of popular opinion “confers insights not available to society,” France concluded.

Saint Anthony of Egypt, the famous Desert Father, chose the hermitic life in deliberate contrast to his upper-crust upbringing. After 20 years locked away, not seeing another human face, Anthony emerged healthy, balanced, and full of sage advice. From then on he alternated between solo retreats and pastoral visits. France likens the pattern to that of scientists who work alone in search of cures for deadly diseases.

You cannot read about hermits, of course, without encountering strangeness. One monk lusted after a beautiful woman. When she died he took his tunic to her tomb and used it to dry the pus from her corpse. Keeping the smell close to him in his cell, he reminded himself, “This is what you lust after—take your fill.”

Some monks competed in a kind of ascetic Olympics, testing how long they could go without food, water, or sleep. These, too, had a method to their madness: their privations caused so much suffering that they left no mental void for carnal thoughts to fill.

France relates other stories that cast a different light on these eremites. When one brother bragged about his dietary discipline, his spiritual director replied, “Don’t tell me, my child, that you’ve spent 30 years without eating meat. But tell me the truth: How many days have you spent without speaking ill of your brother? Without judging your neighbour? Without letting useless words pass your lips?”

The thirst for solitude seems to increase whenever society is in a state of turmoil. Jewish Essenes retreated into the desert in Jesus’ day; the Buddha withdrew in order to purge himself of social illusions; the Hindu Gandhi observed a regimen of strict silence on Mondays, a practice he would not interrupt even for meetings with the king of England.

Solitude rips off all masks and disguises and breaks needless dependence on material goods. Henry

David Thoreau perfected a peculiar American blend of asceticism, love of nature, and self-reliance. A friend once remarked that Thoreau could get more out of 10 minutes with a chickadee than most men could get out of a night with Cleopatra. Thoreau insisted, “I never found the companion that was so companionable as solitude.”

In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, the English landed gentry hired “ornamental hermits.” Recognizing the value of solitude but unwilling to endure its rigors, the wealthy ensconced these surrogates in little hermitages in their fancy gardens. If you can’t devote yourself to a life of simplicity and prayer, why not pay somebody to do it for you?

Thomas Merton was the best apologist for the life of solitude in our century. He viewed life in community as the real sacrifice and made constant appeals for the privilege of solitude, a wish finally granted him after 24 years. Merton longed to join those “men on this miserable, noisy, cruel earth who tasted the marvelous joy of silence and solitude, who dwelt in forgotten mountain cells, in secluded monasteries, where the news and desires and appetites and conflicts of the world no longer reached them.” Nevertheless, he insisted that “the only justification for a life of deliberate solitude is the conviction that it will help you to love not only God but also other men.”

Merton proved that a life of solitude need not lead to isolation or irrelevance. Has our century known a more acute observer of politics, culture, and religion than this monk who rarely spoke and rarely left the grounds of his monastery?

It surprises me that, amid the moral upheaval of our waning century, the church has not responded again with a movement toward solitude. Elijah, Moses, and Jacob met God alone. The apostle Paul, John the Baptist, and Jesus himself escaped to the wilderness for spiritual nourishment.

Relevance, we have surely mastered. The Web pages of religious organizations are technically advanced. New Christian music groups spring up in response to the slightest cultural tremor. What would happen if we sought a little irrelevance?

What if every Christian took a two-hour nature walk each weekend, without speaking? Or if, like Gandhi, we observed a day of silence. He chose Monday; what if we agreed to maintain silence after church on Sunday? More radical still, what if we silenced all Sunday sporting events on television and radio?

I had best stop. As the hermits remind us, these spiritual disciplines can get out of control. C1

Relevance, we have surely mastered.
What would happen if we sought a little irrelevance?

NO ONE BUILDS A BETTER CHAIR THAN BERTOLINI INC.

Unsurpassed Quality: While others use low quality materials like particle board and cheap foam, we use 7 ply marine birch plywood and commercial grade 2 lb. foam. Others offer flat seats and backs, we offer body contoured seating with superior comfort. Simply put, while others try to get by with the bare minimum, Bertolini Inc. builds chairs to last a lifetime. Watch our video and see for yourself.

FREE Fund Raising Program:

Our goal is not just to sell chairs, our goal is to partner in the ministries of local churches. Bertolini Inc. now offers churches FREE fund raising tools and literature to help you afford one of the biggest investments your church will make. Also available is about 100% financing.

Design: We offer over 60 of the most attractive chair designs in the industry today in a wide range of colors and fabrics. Ask about our custom manufacturing capabilities.

Factory Direct: We offer the best prices in the industry because we are the manufacturer, not just the reseller. Tours given daily.

Warranty: We offer the best warranty in the business. We put it in writing and we stand behind it.

Experience: The Bertolini family has over 30 years of chair manufacturing experience. We will be there to service your needs for decades to come. Ask about 100% financing.

SEEING IS BELIEVING

Focussed on a mission.

A.B. Simpson was troubled over masses of people unreached by the gospel, yet he was enthused about the untapped potential within the church. He recognized scores of his 13th Street parishioners as potential messengers of gospel truth to the spiritually needy in the city and to unevangelized millions overseas—if only they had vision and training. Nyack College was born in New York City. After moving his family and the training institute to Nyack in 1897, Simpson continued his personal ministry in the City. He commuted daily on the 6:18 a.m. train from Nyack for twenty years.

Reconnecting with a city.

While Simpson's arms reached around the world, his heart continued to beat in Manhattan. Orphanages, soup kitchens, healing homes, hospices for unwed mothers, missions for the homeless, ethnic language services, and havens for women of the streets were as important to A.B. Simpson as the tabernacle ministry and overseas missions. Never did he lose his special passion for the world's most influential city. Today, Nyack is reconnecting by opening The Nyack College Manhattan Center at 335 Broadway.

Nyack College

One of the hallmarks of Nyack College has been its courage to change when the needs of society have changed. Because Nyack offers a unique, high quality experience of education, training and personal growth through its diverse, urbane community, we believe a Nyack education should be available to as many future workers for God's kingdom as possible.

The Nyack College Manhattan Center, the Korean Extension Program and the traditional program on the Hillside train 1,100 students representing 30 denominations. Forty percent of our students are from ethnic groups, including Asians, Hispanics and African Americans. All are interested in changing the world. Nyack College is preparing them, educating students uniquely prepared for service in scores of culture impacting fields.

The More Things Change...

INSIDE CT

You may have noticed a few changes in the magazine recently. We have given our departments a needed facelift. To better highlight the News section (which readers cite as the second most-valued portion of the magazine), we moved it from the back of the book to the front. We also took the longer lead News story, added it to the feature essays (the most-valued portion), and rechristened it "Special News Report" (though that offering is missing from this, our Annual Books Issue). In the past we saw the News section as "a magazine within a magazine." We now bury that metaphor. We want you to receive a single, focused, and integrated magazine.

We have also taken the bylines off our editorials. We added bylines a few years back so that readers would know the person/resource behind the position being articulated. The unintended consequence was confusion over who was speaking, the writer or the magazine. We hope it is now clear: the editorial communicates the thoughts and passions of the magazine.

Expect more tinkering, but only tinkering. Our mission has not changed. Periodically I take out the blue notebook in which I have gathered all our past "mission statements." The one I find most helpful, prescient, and inspiring is the first one: Billy Graham's 1955 speech outlining why the Christian world needs a magazine called "Christianity Today."

He envisioned (and we affirm) CT as "a rallying point" for evangelicals, "a flag . . . under which we all can gather," a "strong vigorous voice to call us together," to "reach the clergy and laity of every denomination presenting truth from the evangelical viewpoint." He proposed that it carry "hard-hitting editorial; . . . popular, well thought out journalism; . . . the greatest religious news coverage." (Not that we have implemented all his suggestions, such as "at least one evangelistic sermon" in every issue.)

Mr. Graham went on to describe the editorial policy as "pro-church" (amen), "thoroughly biblical, evangelical, and evangelistic" (yes, yes, and a yes with the qualification that the magazine's primary role is encouraging, not engaging in, evangelism), "pro-second advent" but agnostic as to which millennial framework to understand it by (preach it), "anti-communist" (no longer the hot button it was), an advocate for "social improvement" where we are "for the underdog and the down-trodden, as we believe Christ was" (a hearty amen), centrist and "mildly conservative" politically (easier said than done).

Our mission, then, and the reason for the changes, is to do better what we have always tried to do: to report on what God is doing through his church to reconcile the world to himself through and in Christ. CT

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Bringing Up Baby

Many have written to express an opinion about the News update article "Growing Criticism" (Feb. 9) concerning Growing Families International and their Preparation for Parenthood Program. A large number have taken CT to task, citing positive personal experience with the GFI program and suggesting the information we published was biased and even "misleading" to those unfamiliar with Preparation for Parenthood. Expressing a sentiment echoed by many, one parent who is also a nurse wrote, "I have been tremendously blessed and helped by the Ezzos' materials."

At the same time, however, others have applauded CT for, in the words of one, "having the courage to publish a follow-up story on the program that is currently sweeping the nation." A marriage and family therapist, observing families using GFI materials who "join the chorus of how well it's 'working,'" expressed dismay that the "definition of 'working' seems to be limited to the parents' convenience." "I've never heard these parents discuss their children's emotional well-being or how much they enjoy the relationships with them," she says. "I find that grievous."

Randy Frame, who wrote CT's article, suggests that friends of GFI gain access to GFI's "alleged list of supporting physicians. . . . If they can't, perhaps they, like Grace Community Church, will begin asking some of the same questions critics have been asking."

One Who Has Fallen

I want to thank you for your article on Jimmy Swaggart ["Still Wrestling with the Devil," Mar. 2]. It was refreshing to see a more gracious approach toward one who has fallen rather than a critical attack. Randall Balmer made a great point we should remember, that, like Swaggart, we are all human and daily need the grace and forgiveness of God. May God help us to practice Galatians 6:1: "looking to yourself, lest you too be tempted."

*Pastor Joseph Pjecha
Tionesta Alliance Church
Tionesta, Pa.*

Randall Balmer's story on Jimmy Swaggart was one of the saddest I have read in a long time. I had hoped to discover some insight from Swaggart, some deeper understanding of what happened to him, and what true religion really is. But there lingers about him a hint of a victim practicing a type of confession that avoids consequences by convincingly delivering sentimental intensity, not unlike another famous evangelical now making tabloid headlines (President Clinton). Trey Bane Marietta, Ga.

Thank you for the article on Jimmy Swaggart. I agreed with the church on discipline; however, he did at times cause me to pull my truck off the road and have church.

George Moizman Orting, Wash.

When I conducted my first evangelistic meeting after finishing Southwestern Bible Institute in Waxahachie, Texas (now Southwestern Assemblies of God University), in June 1949 at Ferriday, Louisiana, a young teenager attended regularly. His name was Jimmy Swaggart. I had no idea his ministry in TV evangelism would be so far-reaching over the world in the years ahead.

As I have traveled over the world, I have seen the productive work of Jimmy in many countries, where he spent millions helping orphans, building Bible schools, and helping churches during his heyday in evangelism.

I have kept in touch with Jimmy and fully believe that God has used him mightily in years past. I believe he still has a heart of gold.

Mercy, Not Justice

✉ Ronald J. Sider and Fred Clark properly defend government as a God-ordained necessity, but their understanding of justice as going beyond unbiased courts is unconvincing ["Should We Give Up on Government?" March 2]. When God makes the poor in spirit rich in Christ, it is an act of mercy, not justice. Similarly, when individuals, churches, and governments decide to give aid to the poor beyond fair treatment, they are being more than just; they are being merciful. The issue with which many Christians wrestle is not government and the justice it should provide; the issue is how merciful the state should be.

Mark Heijerman Fairfield, N.J.

I'm not sure Sider and Clark get the point about libertarian principles. Though there are varieties of libertarians, the main theme I am hearing from them is that government is not necessarily evil, it just can't do some things very well. They do not want to eliminate government, though they would like to greatly reduce its size and remove many of its unproductive restrictions. The title of the book by Harry Browne, the Libertarian party's 1996 candidate for president, says it concisely: Why Government Doesn't Work.

Libertarians are not giving up on government, but they are provoking the question as to what government should be doing and if there are not better ways to accomplish desirable ends other than having a government program for it.

My memories of growing up in a white, Virginia suburb during the era of Selma and Birmingham and Watts and that "I Have a Dream" speech are still vivid. The pastor of my parents' church was dismissed due to his participation in a civil-rights march, and everyone around me buzzed with contempt and fear of King. Now there are voices on both sides of the racial divide judging him through politically correct lenses that annihilate the historic perspective, while at the same time viewing PK's growing emphases on racial reconciliation (and similar attempts) as mere "hugfests."

What is Alpha? The fastest-growing introductory course to Christianity around the world currently running in 65 countries. As a relationship-based evangelism tool, this exciting course was developed at Holy Trinity Brompton Church in London. Alpha courses are sweeping across the United States, and thousands are being reached with the message of Christ's love and salvation.

How can you learn more?

Informative two-day conferences explain the vision behind Alpha and give practical training. Church leaders and lay people alike will learn how to run a course in their area as they interact with Sandy Millar and Nicky Gumbel, author of many of the Alpha materials.

An Alpha Course

1998 Conference Schedule

June 1 & 2 Kanuga, NC
July 27 & 28 Southern California

July 30 & 31 San Francisco, CA
August 31 & September 1 Seattle, WA
September 3 & 4 Chicago, IL

Reclaiming the Hospice Vision

✉ [With regard to the Special News Report "Hospice Hijacked?" Mar. 2], as a hospice chaplain, I fear that more and more of the patients who worry about being a burden will consider assisted suicide as a way of easing the financial hardship on family and society. Of the various factors that may lead a hospice patient to seek assisted suicide, the most disturbing is the desire to save money. I am alarmed at the number of terminally ill patients who are aware of the high cost of health care and are increasingly inclined to make decisions based on financial considerations.

As an ordained minister, I am further alarmed by the tacit admission of the church that caring for the dying is not often considered an efficient use of resources. How can the original vision of hospice care be reclaimed unless the church returns to its First Love and stops viewing people primarily as economic potentials?

An Open Letter About "The Gift of Salvation"

Because of dialogue with some of their critics, and in the interest of evangelical unity, the evangelical team who helped to draft "The Gift of Salvation" (CT, Dec. 8, 1997, p. 34) decided to explain publicly, in the letter printed below, what their purposes and understanding were as they put together this second Evangelicals and Catholics Together document.

Since its publication in December 1997, "The Gift of Salvation," of which we along with other evangelical and Roman Catholic theologians were signatories, has garnered much attention on both sides of this historic confessional divide. We are eager to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace lest the body of Christ be further fractured through careless conduct or willful disregard on our part. We are thus pleased to respond to various comments and questions concerning the purpose and intended meaning of "The Gift of Salvation."

"The Gift of Salvation" is not an official accord between the Roman Catholic Church and any evangelical church or denomination. It is a good faith effort on the part of some Roman Catholics and some evangelicals to say, with as much clarity as possible, how they understand God's gracious gift of salvation on the basis of the Word of God. We evangelicals who signed "The Gift of Salvation" do not claim a unity of faith with the church of Rome. What we do acknowledge is a unity in Christ with Roman Catholic believers who, no less than we ourselves, have been saved by God's grace and justified by faith alone. Despite our doctrinal differences, we who by faith know, love, trust, and hope in Christ the Mediator are brothers and sisters in the Lord.

We believe that "The Gift of Salvation" is a significant first step in the right direction, but we do not claim that we have reached a complete common agreement on the doctrine of salvation as expressed in the official teachings of our respective communities. As Timothy George wrote in his introduction to "The Gift of Salvation" in the December 1997 issue of CHRISTIANITY TODAY, "We rejoice that our Roman Catholic interlocutors have been able to agree with us that the doctrine of justification set forth in this document agrees with what the Reformers meant by justification by faith alone (sola fide). . . . [But] this still does not resolve all the differences between our two traditions on this crucial matter."

Likewise, Cardinal Edward Cassidy declared: "This does not mean that evangelicals and Catholics have overcome all their doctrinal differences or that their understanding of the gospel and of the Christian message has suddenly become identical. We will surely continue to evangelize according to our beliefs." Yet what we have affirmed together in this document, we believe, is of fundamental importance.

When "The Gift of Salvation" speaks of "needlessly divisive disputes" between Roman Catholics and evangelicals, it does not refer to the many weighty theological matters on which we still conscientiously disagree, such as sacramental theology, Marian devotion, purgatory, and so forth. "The Gift of Salvation" takes note of these matters, referring to them as "serious and persistent differences" which are "necessarily interrelated" with the affirmations we have made in common, and are thus future agenda items for us. The fact that these issues are "on the table" does not mean that they are "up for grabs," but rather that they must be pursued with rigor and honesty in our continuing dialogue. By "needlessly divisive disputes" we mean the kind of mutual recrimination and uncharitable taunting that has resulted in Protestant-bashing and Catholic-baiting in the past and that still persists today.

Our methodology in crafting "The Gift of Salvation" was to study the Bible together and to formulate a statement on salvation derived from and based upon the evidence of Holy Scripture alone. In doing so we were in line with the historic evangelical insistence on the sufficiency of Scripture and the recent Roman Catholic renaissance in biblical studies.

Based on our common study of the Bible, we were able to agree that the work of redemption has been accomplished (a word that means done, completed) by Christ's atoning sacrifice on the cross. "The Gift of Salvation" affirms a declaratory, forensic justification on the sole ground of the righteousness of Christ alone, a standing before God not earned by any good works or merits on our own. It states that in justification, here and now, God graciously constitutes us his forgiven friends, and that is how henceforth we stand in relation to him. In these terms, we intended to affirm nothing less than "justification by grace alone because of Christ alone through faith alone," which is the biblical gospel.

The word imputation (not used in the body of the document) refers to God's crediting of righteousness to us because of what Christ has done for us: which means, God's accounting of Christ's righteousness to all those who are united with him through faith. As evangelicals, we saw this teaching as implicit in the doctrine of justification by faith alone and tried to express it in biblical terms. Our discussion was also informed by the superb biblical scholarship of Fr. Joseph Fitzmyer, whose recent Commentary on Romans illuminates the Pauline meaning of justification:

When, then, Paul in Romans says that Christ Jesus "justified" human beings "by his blood" (3:25; cf. 5:9), he means that by what Christ suffered in his passion and death he has brought it about that sinful human beings can stand before God's tribunal acquitted or innocent, with the judgment not based on observance of the Mosaic Law. . . . Paul insists on the utter gratuity of this justification because "all alike have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (3:23). Consequently, this uprightness does not belong to human beings (10:3), and it is not something that they have produced or merited; it is an alien uprightness, one belonging rightly to another (to Christ) and attributed to them because of what that other has done for them. So Paul understands God "justifying the godless" (4:5) or "crediting uprightness" to human beings quite "apart from deeds."

As we have said before, we do not seek Christian unity at the expense of Christian truth. We are engaged in an ecumenism of conviction, not an ecumenism of accommodation. That commitment to unity in truth alone is held with equal firmness by both the evangelical and Roman Catholic theologians in this ongoing process. We see our statement as expressing, not indeed unity in every aspect of the gospel, but unity in its basic dimension, with hope of that unity being extended through further discussions.

In the sixteenth century, Calvin, Bucer, and Melancthon, among others, met with Roman Catholic theologians to discuss the central doctrines of the Reformation. We, with them, stand in that same tradition, committed to the principle of ecclesia semper reformanda (the church always reforming), and we believe that both doctrinal reformation and Christian unity flow from the gracious work of the Holy Spirit. For this we pray and beg the prayers of all God's people.

Let the Prisoners Compete

I agree on the need for providing training and teaching prisoners real-life skills. However, let me fill you in on the negative impact of prison labor on small businesses ["Let the Prisoners Work," Editorial, Feb. 9]. We have laws prohibiting the importation of products made by prison or slave labor abroad. Yet U.S. companies have to compete against home-grown "slave" labor. A drapery manufacturer in my district is totally shut out of any U.S. government contract to make draperies for federal office buildings because Federal Prison Industries (FPI) has this market all to itself. He is not even allowed to bid on federal government contracts.

In fact, FPI has unilaterally seized all federal government contracts in over 85 different industries, ranging from manufacturers of rocket launchers to furniture makers. In several hearings before the Small Business Committee of the House of Representatives, I have seen ample evidence of FPI displacing U.S. jobs.

The legislation you alluded to came about because the business community's very existence was threatened by this competition from very low-wage prison labor. This bill will promote full, fair, and open competition for all federal contracts by allowing every firm the opportunity to bid. This legislation is simply a matter of balancing training and working of prisoners with the free-market system.

Did Christianity Cause the Holocaust?

The truth is far more complex than the biased film at the tax-supported Holocaust Museum implies.

In defending myself against the Jews, I am acting for the Lord," said Adolf Hitler. "The difference between the church and me is that I am finishing the job." Hitler was lying in an attempt to mislead his public by concealing his own racial animosity behind a mask of Christian language.

Now, a group of prominent Jews has accused the United States Holocaust Museum of the same thing, of misleading the public by blaming Hitler's genocidal program on historic Christian beliefs about Jews (see "Is Holocaust Museum Anti-Christian?," p. 14). The writers of the U.S. Holocaust Museum orientation film Antisemitism, they say, have confused harsh Christian statements about Jewish religion with the race-based ideologies that informed Nazism. In addition, they have taken Hitler's explanation for his motivations at face value. Should Hitler's attempts to use the church to justify himself tell us any more about Christian theology than, say, David Koresh's ravings tell us about the Bible?

Hundreds of thousands of Christians who have visited the United States Holocaust Museum have sat and squirmed through all 14 minutes of the film's loose linking of historic Christian condemnation of Jewish refusal to believe in Jesus with Nazi racism. Most of those Christians, vaguely aware that there has been persistent prejudice against Jews for most of European history, have meekly accepted the film's claims and have not protested the inclusion of this anti-Christian message in a tax-funded national museum.

In December, however, six Jews, Jews who knew the horrific facts of historic Christian anti-Semitism, did indeed protest, sending a letter to the then director of the museum, Walter Reich. In that letter, Michael Horowitz, Elliott Abrams, and other notable Jewish thinkers called attention to the film's unfairness in portraying anti-Semitism in almost exclusively Christian terms. And since then they have taken a lot of heat for their stance—from The New Republic to vile personal attacks via e-mail.

The film paints with a broad brush. A dull voice intones disconnected facts and quotations that leave the viewer believing that anti-Jewish bias is the result of Christian influence on the Roman Empire, that it has been Christian society alone that has marginalized and oppressed Jews, and that Nazi racial prejudice against the Jews was in clear continuity with earlier religious prejudice. The anti-Judaism that preceded Christianity and that has long existed outside Europe is ignored.

Certainly one reason American Christians have not heretofore protested the dubious film is that they are largely unaware of the history of Christian anti-Judaism. They have heard, vaguely, about ghettos and pogroms, and they may have heard that Christians once called Jews "Christ-killers" and circulated rumors that blamed Jews for the Black Death. But they have not studied their own history, and they have no framework in which to place isolated facts and evaluate the claims of this film.

Facts without a framework

Let's be clear: From its very earliest days, Christianity spoke ill of "the Jews." The apostles (all of them Jews) felt deeply the rejection of their good news about Jesus from their own community's leaders, and they took the gospel to a more receptive Gentile audience. The internal disputes between Jesus and the leaders of various, competing Judaisms were transposed into a setting where the inner divisions of Judaism were obscured. Paul's hope for a church in which barriers between Jews and Gentiles were obliterated turned into a barricaded community.

From the early second century, the church fathers, puzzled over the fact that Jewish leaders did not interpret their own Scriptures as Jesus and his apostles had, concluded that the Jews were blind, obdurate, stubborn, hard-hearted—and possibly demonic. John Chrysostom called the Jews, "... inveterate murderers, destroyers, men possessed by the devil, [whom] debauchery and drunkenness have given ... the manners of the pig and the lusty goat." Despite their harsh words, many of the Fathers did not cease to appeal for Jews to come to Jesus (though, tragically, they required such converts to give up their Jewishness). Nor did church leaders advise or officially support violence against Jews: the Jews were to be preserved in misery as a sign of reprobation, the Fathers concluded, until the Last Day when God would exact judgment.

From Constantine to the Renaissance (with the notable, bloody exception of the Spanish Inquisition), both the "Christianized" empire and the imperialized church protected the existence of Jews, while progressively restricting their rights and their economic activity. On the whole, it was mobs, stirred by fanatics, who were responsible for the burning of synagogues and the killing of Jews. Church and state needed Jews, both to prop up a triumphalist theology and to foster finance and trade. And at times when other non-Christian religions were not tolerated, they protected the Jews' radically circumscribed existence.

For all the horrible history of Christian European anti-Judaism, it was almost always a cultural and theological prejudice, not a racial one, and therefore it was at least possible for Jews to escape the pressures through assimilation and conversion. Sadly, when they refused conversion, they faced even further straitening of their circumstances, as when Martin Luther, deeply disappointed by Jewish lack of interest in his Reformation, called them "this damned, rejected race," and advised the German princes to raze their synagogues and houses and forbid their rabbis to teach.

Nazi anti-Semitism was different. It targeted Jews as a race. Even those who had been baptized and assimilated were sought and rooted out, even from monasteries and convents. It was their fantasized racial characteristics that threatened the mythology of Aryan blood purity.

In March, John Paul II emphasized that same distinction between historic Christian anti-Judaism and various secular, racist anti-Semitismisms in his cautiously worded apology for the role some "sons and daughters of the Church" played in the Holocaust. Nazi acts and ideology, he claimed, had their "roots outside of Christianity."

Some have complained that this distinction cannot bear the weight the pope puts on it. And surely there is a debate to be had: To what degree did Christian beliefs about Jewish unbelief merely set the historical stage for the Holocaust, and to what degree did they actually contribute to the Holocaust? But this requires a complex and careful analysis that no 14-minute film (nor even an hour-long television special) can be made to bear.

The wages of guilt

Yes, Christians have plenty to apologize for in the way we have treated Jews in the past. But accurate history is vital for many reasons, among them this: indiscriminate guilt-mongering can lead Christians to be unfaithful to their own faith.

Take, for example, this comment attributed by the New York Times to National Council of Churches general secretary Joan Brown Campbell: "If you look at the Nazi regime, you can see in it the philosophy of Christian superiority." Campbell's remark was inaccurate, ignoring Nazi beliefs about the defects in historic Christianity. But it was also made in an interview in which she undercut the rising concern about persecution of Christians around the globe. Her timidity about the claims of Christ caused her to cast doubt on the efforts others are making to save lives and to spare believers from torture and imprisonment.

Likewise, Rosemary Radford Ruether's fascinating historical account of Christian anti-Judaism, Faith and Fratricide (1974), called Christians to abandon the belief that Jesus is the savior for everyone in favor of the notion that Jesus is the savior of some, while others will have their own "saviors." Overwhelmed by the history she recounts, Ruether is convinced that anti-Judaism is the inevitable corollary of believing Jesus is the savior of the world.

Christians must confront their anti-Judaism, but they cannot retreat from the core of their faith. Making unwarranted connections between Christianity's true-to-itself claims for Jesus and the tragedy of the Holocaust leads Christians like Campbell to the brink of denying their Lord (something about which Jesus himself had strong words) and to undercut an important humanitarian movement.

A museum of conscience

The concerned Jews' protest didn't receive the public attention it should have because the museum was soon after embroiled in a controversy over an invitation to Yasser Arafat to visit the exhibit. Museum director Reich fought the invitation and refused to be part of the welcoming committee. He was fired February 18. "This is a matter of conscience for me," Reich said, "and this is a museum of conscience."

As a museum of conscience, the U.S. Holocaust Museum has a responsibility to report how Jews have suffered, in large part because of morally repugnant stereotyping. How ironic and sad that its own film should foster inaccurate stereotypes of Christianity!

The museum celebrates its fifth anniversary this month. The controversies have come at a bad time, casting a shadow over an institution all Americans should take pride in. But what better time is there to correct the egregious stereotyping of this film and assure the public of the care and accuracy with which the museum's exhibits report the most tragic event of the twentieth century?

As communities of conscience, the churches also have a big burden. That burden is, first, to educate their members on the history of both Judaism and anti-Judaism. Contact with those for whom Judaism is a living faith is essential so that Christians do not think that Judaism froze in fixed form in the first century. (Some of the nastiest comments early church fathers made about Jews reveal they no longer had active contact with living Judaism.)

Second, the churches' burden is to take care in how we preach about Jews in the Scriptures—not treating Pharisee as a simple synonym for hypocrite, for example, and not treating the Old Testament (as many have done) as a simple history of unbelief or as a mere codebook of messianic clues. Indeed, here American evangelicals have an advantage, thanks to the appreciative reading of the Old Testament handed to us by our Puritan forebears, and thanks to the more positive reading of the preservation of the Jews popularized by dispensationalism.

Above all, let us avoid triumphalism. Deaf to the invitation to self-examination brought by the biblical prophets, the Fathers applied their criticism only to the Jews. They spoke only of the church's glories, and forgot that the prophets' challenges apply also to us. CT

Courts Divided on Scouting

Courts in two states gave conflicting rulings in March as to whether the Boy Scouts of America is exempt from civil-rights laws in restricting its membership.

On March 23, the California Supreme Court ruled that Boy Scouts can bar homosexuals, atheists, or agnostics because the group as a private association is exempt from civil-rights laws.

However, on March 2, the New Jersey Court of appeals ruled that the 1990 dismissal of homosexual Scout leader James Dale was "wrongful and discriminatory."

Scouts spokesperson Gregg Shields says the New Jersey ruling will be appealed. "The group has a right as a voluntary organization to teach youth the traditional values that it has taught since 1910 and to establish membership and leadership standards."

The Boy Scout oath acknowledges a duty to God and requires scouts to keep "physically strong, mentally awake and morally straight." Dale contended that homosexuality is not immoral.

In a lower court ruling in 1995, New Jersey Superior Court Judge Patrick McGann said the Boy Scouts were within their rights as a private association to remove Dale, now 27, as assistant scoutmaster.

However, the three-judge appeals court determined that the Boy Scouts are a "public accommodation" and had violated antidiscrimination laws. Jay Sekulow of the American Center for Law and Justice says there is precedent for winning at the highest court. In 1996, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that a veterans group did not have to include homosexuals in its Saint Patrick's Day parade.

Social Principles found in the UMC's Book of Discipline, which forbids ministers from performing homosexual-union ceremonies. Nebraska bishop Joel Martinez suspended Creech last November.

Creech maintained the Social Principles are not binding. He says the verdict "shows we are guided more by God's grace and love than regulations."

But Jim Heideringer, publisher of the UMC's evangelical newspaper Good News, says the denomination remains sharply divided over the homosexuality issue. "It has really threatened the unity of the church," he says. Martinez adds, "The continuing division of opinion and convictions on this matter will require of us spiritual maturity." The evangelical Confessing Movement in the UMC stated, "It threatens the connection and the ties that bind us together in worship and ministry."

Pastor Acquitted in Ceremony Trial

A jury of Nebraska United Methodist ministers fell one vote short of convicting Omaha First United Methodist Church (UMC) pastor Jimmy Creech on March 14 of disobeying denominational rules by performing a same-sex ceremony uniting two lesbians in his congregation last September.

Although eight of the thirteen jury members voted to convict Creech, the tally was one vote shy of the requirement for a guilty verdict.

The trial is the first challenge of the current UMC policy against homosexual-union ceremonies. The result could shape the policy of the nation's second-largest Protestant denomination toward homosexuals.

Is Holocaust Museum Anti-Christian?

Six prominent Jews are accusing the U.S. Holocaust Museum of anti-Christian bias in showing a 14-minute film on the roots of anti-Semitism.

The film alleges that Christian churches played a key role in promoting anti-Semitism, leading to Nazi Germany's genocide of European Jewry during World War II. In a letter to the director of the Holocaust Museum, the group, led by Michael Horowitz of the Hudson Institute, wrote, "We believe that the film advances a profoundly inaccurate thesis: that Christianity and Christian leaders were the initial causes of anti-Semitism," and that "the film repeats and prop-agates libels of Christianity" (see "Did Christianity Cause the Holocaust? p.12).

Other signers are film critic Michael Medved, historian

Awaiting "selection": Hungarian Jews at the railhead of Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp in Poland in 1944.

David Dalin, and Reagan administration official Elliot Abrams. Holocaust Museum spokesperson Howard White counters, "This film is a product of much scholarship and has been reviewed by the 17-member museum's church-relations committee, which consists of theologians and historians both Protestant and Catholic."

However, Marc Saperstein, a professor of Jewish history, argues, "The case for emphasizing the continuity between Christian doctrine and the Nazi death camps is not ultimately persuasive."

Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein, president of the Chicago-based International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, says, "I do think that the history of Christians' attitudes, policies, and views towards Jews at least created the fertile ground in which anti-Semitism grew and spread."

Federal Judges Block Restrictions

State legislatures in 20 states have passed partial-birth abortion bans, but efforts to implement the laws have been repeatedly stymied by court rulings, primarily at the federal level.

Currently, 11 states are facing court challenges. Ban opponents argue that the definitions of partial-birth abortion are vaguely worded and that an exception based on the health of the mother is needed.

"Until the Supreme Court deals directly with partial-birth abortion, nobody is going to know whether these laws are constitutional or not," suggests Nik Nikas, counsel for Americans United for Life in Chicago.

The Supreme Court seems to be in no hurry to settle the matter. In a 6-to-3 decision on March 23, the justices refused to review a lower court ruling that had invalidated a 1995 Ohio law restricting partial-birth abortion.

Nevertheless, Mary Spaulding-Balch, director of state legislation for the National Right to Life Committee, says partial-birth abortion bans are supported across the political spectrum.

"The momentum has not stopped even though there have been court injunctions," Spaulding-Balch says. State legislatures have overridden gubernatorial vetoes in Alaska, New Jersey, and Florida. In Congress, the issue is expected to be raised a third straight year.

State legislatures began enacting bans following President Clinton's second veto (CT, Oct. 27, 1997, p. 70). [CT]

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

Panel Advances Istook Proposal

A constitutional amendment that would allow prayer in public schools, religious symbols on government property, and tax dollars for religious schools passed its first hurdle March 4.

Voting along party lines, the House Judiciary Committee approved the Religious Freedom Amendment sponsored by Rep. Ernest Istook (R-Okla.) 16 to 11, paving the way for a vote by the House.

Republicans have tried unsuccessfully for the past 15 years to pass similar legislation.

Some Christian organizations have been seeking to amend the Constitution more specifically since the U.S. Supreme Court barred state-sponsored public school prayer and Bible reading in the early 1960s. Supporters of the amendment say it is necessary because the court system has overstepped its authority in restricting religious practices. But critics, such as Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for the Separation of Church and State, say the amendment would "subject schoolchildren to coercive prayer in public schools."

However, Istook says the amendment will not permit "government establishment" of religion. He says the biggest difficulty in gaining passage "will be correcting the misunderstanding people have of the phrase separation of church and state."

The amendment faces a substantial hurdle before becoming law. More than 10,000 constitutional amendments have been introduced as legislation but only 26 have passed. A two-thirds vote for ratification is needed in both the House and Senate, then legislatures in three-fourths of the states must approve it before becoming law.

"It's an uphill fight, but we think that it's an important effort," says Arne Owens, director of communications for the Christian Coalition. "We plan to be very active with our efforts to build support for passing the amendment." [CT]

From Trauma to Truth

Once-abused children demand accountability.

Life changed drastically for Richard Darr just before he turned six. Under Christian and Missionary Alliance (C&MA) rules, he could no longer stay with his parents, who spent nine months at a stretch evangelizing in the West African nation of Mali. At the C&MA Mamou Alliance Academy in Guinea, he could only communicate with his parents, 300 miles away, through letters, and he was forbidden to write anything negative.

But Darr and at least 30 other children at the West African boarding school suffered a more harrowing form of alienation. From 1950 to 1971, children were beaten with belts, forced to eat their own vomit, punched and slapped in the face, coerced into performing oral sex, required to sit in their own feces, fondled, and beaten with a strap to the point of bleeding.

Not until 1995, after persistent complaints by a group of adults who had been Mamou students, did the C&MA impanel a commission to investigate.

The panel's 95-page report, filed after 18 months of research and interviews, identifies nine offenders; four are retired, three are dead, and two are no longer affiliated with the C&MA. Two individuals who refused to cooperate with the panel have been convicted at denominational disciplinary hearings.

The commission faulted the denomination for improper training, poor oversight, and negligence. The Mamou staff, rather than being loving surrogate parents, punished too frequently and affirmed too little, the report indicates.

Richard W. Bailey, chair of the C&MA's board of managers, sent a letter expressing regret to Mamou alumni in January. "Please accept our heartfelt apology for our inadequate supervision and understanding of the happenings at Mamou Academy, while you were a student."

SAFEGUARDING THE FUTURE: But an apology has not brought full satisfaction. "What happened to us is not an isolated instance," says Darr, now a 43-year-old United Methodist pastor in Libertyville, Illinois. "Evangelical missions are too quick to forgive in these situations, and sometimes the offenders are allowed to continue in ministry and repeat the violations."

Darr hopes to see the formation of a permanent interagency committee that deals with such allegations. Children of missionaries have reported similar abuse at other boarding schools in West Africa.

"To rectify the past, we need to safeguard the future," says Darr, who notes that 120 North American missions organizations still operate boarding schools, with a combined number of 15,000 students.

Darr urges mission agencies to teach leaders how to detect child abuse, conduct thorough background checks on employees, and publicly discipline convicted abusers.

Survivor: Darr suffered abuse at the hands of dorm parents, a teacher, and a nurse during first and second grades.

INITIAL ACCUSATIONS DOUBTED: A decade ago, most parents and denominational officials balked when they first heard reports of abuse.

"We wouldn't have believed our children," says Henry Neudorf of Osler, Saskatchewan. "We had been thoroughly brainwashed into thinking that they were being taken care of by dedicated people." While Neudorf, 75, and his wife, Hazel, worked to establish churches in Mali, three of their four children were physically abused at Mamou. After a period of estrangement, the Neudorf children and parents have reconciled.

Following years of receiving little sympathy from the denomination, a committee that was composed of abuse victims went public with the allegations (CT, Aug. 14, 1995, p. 60). Soon afterwards, the C&MA agreed to pay most of the therapy bills for abuse victims.

Many abused children came to hate not only the Mamou staff and their parents, but God. Amazingly, half of them are active in ministry, several of them in prominent posts, including Compassion International president Wess Stafford.

At the time, boarding-school officials ordered students not to upset their parents, lest ministry be compromised.

Largely in response to the accusations, the C&MA has made changes in its missions policies. "We have better screening and better training," Bailey told CT. "Once on location, we have very close supervision and careful accountability." The denomination now allows parents to home school their children or send them to nearby private schools.

CULPRITS CONVICTED: Two of the accused C&MA retirees confessed before the commission and accepted the denomination's counseling offer.

However, two others who denied any wrongdoing were found guilty by a six-member church tribunal in November.

An accused houseparent suggested the complaints had been fabricated by those "who desired to injure his reputation." The C&MA suspended his credentials after the discipline committee unanimously ruled that overwhelming evidence showed him guilty of sexual, physical, and psychological abuse. There will be no further punishment. Pursuing the matter in civil or criminal courts would be extremely difficult since the abuse occurred so long ago and in a foreign country.

"The accused are in their late seventies and early eighties," Bailey says. "What kind of discipline can you mete out?"

But Beverly Shellrude Thompson of Burlington, Ontario, Canada, says abusers do not automatically stop.

"One of my perpetrators was a nurse who still had access to children until a year ago," says Shellrude Thompson, 45. "Perpetrators usually don't stop because they get old."

But Bailey hopes a denomination-sponsored Mamou reunion in June will bring closure to the matter. In the meantime, former missionary children are frustrated that a more detailed report of recommendations the independent commission sent to the C&MA has not been distributed to affected parties as promised.

"If this information doesn't get out into the open, we'll be back to square one," Darr says. "It will be like an open, festering wound."

Does 'The Gift of Salvation' Sell Out the Reformation?

The recent statement from evangelical and Roman Catholic leaders on the Christian doctrine of justification "sells out" the Reformation, according to James Boice, chairman of the Alliance of Confessing Evangelicals (ACE).

The Alliance in late February issued a pointed response to "The Gift of Salvation," a statement from Evangelicals and Catholics Together (ECT) on the doctrine of justification and the mandate for global evangelism (CT, Jan. 12, 1998, p. 61). ECT is an independent group of scholars and ministry leaders, formed in 1994. "I hate to use selling us out, but it seems to me that's what it does," Boice said to CHRISTIANITY TODAY of the latest ECT document, a follow-up to an earlier controversial statement (CT, May 15, 1995, p. 53). "It really sells out the Reformation." But ECT evangelicals vehemently disagree. Timothy

George argues, "We are engaged in an ecumenism of conviction, not an ecumenism of accommodation."

As evangelical scholars have evaluated "The Gift of Salvation," many have given cautious support, but others, such as Boice, have been sounding the alarm. ACE's "Appeal to Fellow Evangelicals" (www.Christianity.net/ct/archives) notes that "The Gift of Salvation" has "divided evangelicals from evangelicals [and] revealed that the unity we thought we had was not as deep as we believed."

The ACE statement asserts that "Gift of Salvation" falls short of the "biblical and Reformation doctrine of sola fide [faith alone]," that it is a misleading attempt to "bring harmony via ambiguous formulas," and that it undermines evangelistic outreach, especially in Catholic-majority countries.

The ten signers, mostly scholars, authors and pastors, of the ACE appeal include R. C. Sproul, John Armstrong, Michael Horton, and Boice. Philadelphia-based ACE was formed to recall the evangelical movement to its roots in the Protestant Reformation (CT, June 17, 1996, p. 62).

WHERE'S THE GOSPEL? "The Gift of Salvation" affirms justification by faith alone. But ACE argues there are "irreconcilable" differences between historic Protestant and Catholic understandings of how God reconciles sinners to himself. The appeal says, "We see [imputed righteousness] as the heart of the Gospel."

The Protestant Reformers held that God justifies believers by imputing Christ's righteousness to them. But Catholic doctrine, formulated in response to the Reformation, taught that God saves the faithful by infusing them with Christ's righteousness through a process that requires human cooperation. As a result, one of the enduring fault lines between historic Protestantism and Catholicism is the question of whether a faithful Christian has full assurance of salvation

NAE Rethinks Mission

Departing leader calls for better use of resources.

For several years, National Association of Evangelicals (NAE) leaders have recognized they must appeal to a broader constituency. But now, with the imminent departure of president Don Argue, the organization is poised for additional restructuring in order to maintain its focus and vitality.

At its annual meeting last month in Orlando, leaders underscored the importance of this transition period.

"The NAE can't move into the new millennium as just another parachurch ministry," Argue declared. "The paradigms have changed." He says the Carol Stream, Illinois-based organization needs to become a network resource center and technological data base for evangelical ministries—but he is not the person to oversee such a realignment.

"I haven't accomplished everything I wanted to, but the NAE needs someone with gifts that are different than mine," Argue, 58, told CT.

Argue has raised the profile of NAE, climaxed by meetings with religious and government leaders in China (CT, April 6, 1998, p. 26). In his three years at the NAE helm, Argue has become cochair of the State Department's Subcommittee on Religious Freedom and Persecution Abroad, a post in which he will continue. He will become president of Northwest College in Kirkland, Washington, on June 1 (CT, Feb. 9, 1998, p. 92).

AGING CONSTITUENCY: While the evangelical movement has changed dramatically in the past 40 years, the NAE has not. The average age of NAE direct-mail donors is now over 70.

"Large denominations, parachurch ministries, and colleges are now doing their own thing," Argue told CT. "A new compelling motivation to work together must be discovered."

At the meeting, Carol S. Childress, information broker with the Dallas-based Leadership Network, cautioned that younger Christians are not as loyal to institutions as older believers are.

"To those under 50, real-life ministry is not meeting inside church walls," says

Childress, 49. "Few are giving to sustain ongoing organizations." Rather, Childress says, they tend to form ad hoc alliances that are dissolved once a particular mission is accomplished.

"Most members of NAE have been shaped by hierarchical structures," Childress told CT. "But that's not the world we're living in today."

RESHAPING THE MOLD: Part of NAE's concerns stem from its success. The organization has spun off several ministries that have their own boards and agendas, such as National Religious Broadcasters. While the 49 member denominations include some as large as Argue's own 2.5 million-member Assemblies of God, the NAE includes many tiny groups, such as the Evangelical Methodist Church and the Pentecostal Free Will Baptist Church. Many are members in order to have a lobbying link to Washington, D.C., via the NAE's government-affairs office.

R. Lamar Vest, who started a two-year term as NAE chair last month, sees denominational diversity as the organization's largest asset. "There is still a common mission."

Vest is first assistant general overseer for the Church of God in Cleveland, Tennessee. He concurs with Argue's goals of making NAE more inclusive for minorities, women, and younger people.

"The life and vibrancy of any movement depends on how broad a participation can be brought on board," Vest, 57, told CT.

"Some dramatic changes are going to have to be made."

STOPGAP MOVES: The search for a new president could take a year. In the interim, David L. Melvin, 39, has been named director of operations. He has been with NAE for a decade, including three years as vice president. Melvin, an ordained Reformed Church in America minister, will be a candidate for the president's post.

"Evangelicalism as it is perceived across America seems to be getting broader," Melvin says. "NAE must establish what makes us the National Association of Evangelicals."

That broadening needs to reach those who historically have not played a large role in the NAE, according to Leonard Hofman, who completed a two-year term as chair. "NAE must obviously be more gender-inclusive," says Hofman, a 70-year-old former executive of the Christian Reformed Church in North America. Currently, the 15-member NAE executive board includes only two women.

RACIAL RECONCILIATION: Nonetheless, the NAE is trying to be more inclusive. For example, 20 percent of the executive board is African American. Next January, 200 evangelical leaders will gather in Atlanta for a joint summit of the NAE and National Black Evangelical Association, which has been a separate entity for 35 years. Leaders hope to emerge with a plan of action on common strategies, rather than merely asking questions.

"Racism and reconciliation are not on the radar screen of most white evangelicals, because we don't deal with it daily," Argue says. "Racism is always on the agenda at black evangelical meetings because they deal with it every day."

Edward L. Foggs, an African American, is next in line for the NAE chair in 2000. He is general secretary of the Leadership Council for the Church of God in Anderson, Indiana.

"NAE is trying to be a strong advocate for racial reconciliation, which has not always been its strongest suit," Foggs says. "Positive change is taking place."

Another New Era?

Millions lost in double-your-money scam.

In a double-your-money scam, remarkably similar to the New Era Philanthropy scandal (CT, Oct. 27, 1997, p. 86), a Los Angeles-area woman has been convicted in a $4.4 million fraud case.

After the March 6 verdict in Wichita, Kansas, federal Judge Monti Belot denounced Priscilla Deters, 63, as a "danger to any honest person." Deters could be sentenced to four years in prison for each of the 12 counts. She could also be fined up to $250,000. Sentencing is set for May 22.

Deters's company, Productions Plus, promised church groups it would make "matching gifts" for their projects if they first put up "deposits," which Deters held for a year.

"The premise is savings and convenience and the result is good," her materials stated. In response, church groups in 21 states, mainly evangelical Nazarenes and Friends (Quakers), poured nearly $6.5 million into Productions Plus between 1990 and 1995. Deters pledged that funds would be kept safe in certificates of deposit, while matching gifts were to come from highly profitable businesses she ran. "I am a service agency without a fee," Deters stated in 1991. "I have one purpose, and that is to bring service to the community."

EARLY PAYOFFS: While slightly more than $2 million made its way back to investors, checks and bank statements detailed how she paid off early depositors with money from later ones in a classic Ponzi scheme. Prosecutors showed that Deters, instead of safeguarding her clients' funds, spent $4.4 million on herself and her family.

"If there were business profits," says Kansas State investigator Gary Fulton, who searched six years of bank records, "I never found them." Deters gave more than $1 million to her four sons for work performed for Productions Plus. She gave a $200,000 gift to help a son buy a home and paid $120,000 in wages to her mother, who died in 1994 at age 97. Some $18,000 was spent on dental work. "She was a shrewd, calculating thief," argued prosecutor Annette Gurney.

'GREAT FINANCIAL OPPORTUNITY': Deters recruited churches with the help of endorsements from prominent church figures, especially in Friends circles.

The most important came from T. Eugene Coffin, who recommended Deters in 1988 while chair of a national Friends Ministers Conference. At his behest, conference planners placed $7,500 with Deters; a year later she returned $50,000 to the group. When news of the generous matching gift spread, pastors and superintendents lined up to sign up. (Coffin now Trial and tribulation: Deters leaves federal court after the first day of testimony. She is out of jail after posting $200,000 bond.

has Alzheimer's disease and did not testify.)

Maurice Roberts, superintendent of the Friends' Mid-America Yearly Meeting in Wichita, collected $439,000 from his churches to send to Deters. Roberts was forced to resign in October 1994 when it became clear that the yearly meeting faced losses of as much as $200,000. R. J. Wegner, who oversaw Nazarene congregations in North Dakota and South Dakota, collected $600,000, more than $500,000 of which disappeared in the scheme. In a letter to pastors, Wegner wrote, "I, as your district superintendent, am very excited, happy, and thrilled with this great financial opportunity knocking at our door. We cannot afford to pass this up."

Other groups drawn into the scam included the Houston Graduate School of Theology, a decade-old Friends-related seminary in Texas, that saw in Deters an opportunity to obtain funds to help build a new campus. It mounted a fundraising campaign around the plan and bought a large tract of land with her early payments.

But the school later lost more than $250,000. The new campus remains unbuilt, the land has been put up for sale, and the school has fallen behind in its repayment of funds borrowed to sink into the scheme.

The Friends Church in Cherokee, Oklahoma, recruited community members to send $475,000, planning to use its gifts to build a worship and community center. Cherokee's loss is in excess of $400,000. Other victims included John Wesley College in High Point, North Carolina, Barclay College in Haviland, Kansas, and Indiana Wesleyan University in Marion, Deters's alma mater.

Individuals also lost large sums. For example, Mary Washburn, a widow in Cherokee, invested her entire $68,000 life savings in the failed community center venture; Allen Dace, a retired Nazarene pastor from Chatham, Illinois, put $154,000 into a nonexistent electronic sign business that Deters claimed was producing copious profits.

LEGAL TROUBLES: Many victims described Deters as charismatic and highly persuasive when presenting her program. But prosecutors charged that she failed to tell her victims that in 1991 cease-and-desist orders had been issued against her in California, North Dakota, and South Dakota by securities commissioners in those states. California followed up its order with an injunction in 1995, and a civil-contempt citation in 1997. The federal indictment in Wichita came in December 1996.

In 1991, when Wegner, the Nazarene superintendent, learned about North Dakota's cease-and-desist order, he defiantly declared he would rather "believe people in the church," and sent the money to Deters anyway. At the trial, Wegner said, "You could say I was rather innocent, and maybe a little on the dumb side."

Deters's defense counsel, Steve Gradert—appointed by the court because Deters said she could not afford one—attempted to portray her as "an honest, hardworking Christian woman" victimized by a shadowy conspiracy involving church officials who were "working for Satan." However, Gradert presented no concrete evidence of any conspiracy. Deters did not testify at the trial.

Will New Christian TV Network Beat the Odds?

Industry naysayers have not dented the confidence of Lowell "Bud" Paxson in the television network he is birthing. Due to be launched in August, Pax Net will offer family-oriented programming that addresses issues of faith. And like its flagship offering—reruns of Touched by an Angel—Paxson plans to confound his critics.

"Sure there are skeptics out of Hollywood and the TV industry: no sex, no violence, no ratings," Paxson says. "But I have no doubt that mainstream media will recognize that talking about God is a good thing and can make you money. The success in any network start-up is counterprogramming."

That strategy—programming that targets an underserved audience—combined with Paxson's entrepreneurial savvy, has been successful before.

"Bud's track record is pretty impressive," says Jerry Rose, president of Christian Communications of Chicagoland, which recently sold WCFC TV-38 in Chicago to Paxson for $120 million in cash.

MIDAS TOUCH: Certainly Paxson has proved that he can make money. The West Palm Beach, Florida, resident apprenticed as an entrepreneur in the radio industry, founded the Home Shopping Network in 1982, and took his company public in 1986. He founded the Silver King Communications group of broadcast television stations, eventually amassing a dozen, eight of them in the top ten U.S. markets. Paxson sold both enterprises in 1990.

Since then he has bought and sold a number of properties, including the Travel Channel. Paxson Communications went public in 1994. The company owns, or is close to acquiring, 73 television stations for Pax Net, which, when combined, can reach 70 percent of U.S. households.

Paxson, 63-year-old chair and CEO of Paxson Communications, says Pax Net will project a "God flavor." Programming will raise the issue of faith, but not drive it home by pounding on a pulpit. "TV can only plant the seed about the Father and Jesus," Paxson says. "When Christian TV tries to be all things, it fails. As a whole... it's not doing much for the kingdom."

His goal is to craft excellent entertainment programming. "We forget what we were created for, which is to worship God and show him in all his glory," Paxson says. "God will be glorified by storytelling."

"He has a point worth listening to," says Brandt Gustavson, president of the National Religious Broadcasters. "I think there's room for all of us to do the thing God has called us to do."

Paxson began his journey of faith in 1986 following the breakup of his second marriage. He remarried in 1990 and now places his Christianity at the center of his personal life and business plans.

Christian entrepreneur: Paxson is hinging Pax Net's hopes on reruns of Touched by an Angel, currently the top-rated drama on CBS.

In 1992, he cofounded the nonprofit Christian Network (CT, Oct. 2, 1995, p. 98). The network produces worship and praise programming, which is aired overnight on Paxson stations and 100 other independent stations. Paxson also is planting a new church in West Palm Beach.

He credits his business success to such acts of Christian obedience to God. "If you take a piece of your capital, commerce, management time, and profit and devote it to something [God] directs, he will have your business grow," says Paxson.

TIMING IS EVERYTHING: But Paxson is also quick to seize an opportunity. He sees a hunger for quality family programming. Years ago, broadcaster Pat Robertson, founder of the Family Channel, had a similar vision. But that cable channel has been sold to Fox Network mogul Rupert Murdoch, who is shifting the programming focus toward children (CT, July 14, 1997, p. 60).

Andi Sporkin, vice president of communications for CBS, agrees. "Without question, there's an audience for that kind of programming. He has the potential to be enormously successful."

Pax Net hopes to build on the success of the CBS drama Touched by an Angel, which faced its own uphill battle when it first aired four seasons ago. "It had every factor to fail," says Sporkin. Now it is the second-highest-ranking drama on television.

Investors have been skittish about Paxson's plans. Pax Net stock dropped a couple of points following the announcement, but it recently has returned to former levels. Paxson is resolute that Americans are hungry for spiritual enrichment, pointing to the curiosity awakened by the end of the millennium.

Pax Net has spent more than $200 million to acquire reruns of Touched by an Angel, Promised Land, Dr. Quinn Medicine Woman, and Christy, all of which originally appeared on CBS. From Focus on the Family, Pax Net will broadcast The Last Chance Detective Series. The network will air at least one original show: Celebrities and Charities, which is like Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous with a charitable twist.

Implicit in the Pax Net strategy is positioning for the emergence of digital television. Rose sold TV-38 in anticipation of that. Conversion to meet government standards by 2000 will cost around $13 million per station, Rose says. Pax Net has deep pockets and is better able to comply than the typical independent station owner.

But there is humility and a self-deprecating sense of humor in Paxson's witness as evidenced in the title of his autobiography, Threading the Needle, to be published in August by HarperCollins. "I can see the head and shoulders of my camel popping through the needle," he says, referring to Mark 10:25. But Paxson is still pushing from behind to finish the job.

or remains uncertain until death.

In discussing justification, "The Gift of Salvation" does not use either the term imputed or infused, causing ACE to view the document as "dangerously ambiguous."

ECT signer George argues that the purpose of "The Gift of Salvation" was to develop a joint statement on justification by contemporary evangelicals and Roman Catholics. Jesuit scholar Avery Dulles, an ECT signer, says, "We were careful to follow Trent, the teaching of the Second Vatican Council . . . we are not far-out Catholic theologians."

George, in a written response (see Letters, p. 9), says, "As evangelicals, we see this teaching [on imputation] as implicit in the doctrine of justification by faith alone and tried to express it in biblical terms."

ACE's Armstrong agrees that some Catholics and evangelicals are coming to "similar understandings" of what the Bible says. But he believes "The Gift of Salvation" lines up with historic Catholic dogma in ways that are unacceptable to evangelicals. He says, "The way the document is worded, Catholics can sign it and still hold on to what the church teaches." George says ECT evangelicals do not have "unity of faith with the Church of Rome," but do have a "unity in Christ" with Catholic believers.

CLEAR TO WHOM? In spite of the ECT goal of restating the doctrine of justification with "clarity and charity," ACE leaders believe the theological waters have been muddied. Armstrong says, "I don't think the average layperson, and even the average pastor, is able to make those distinctions [of doctrine] quite so clearly." ACE asserts that "The Gift of Salvation" agreement "is not really agreement, and the declaration of unity is at best misleading and at worse fraudulent."

However, ECT leaders believe that both sides were open about where they achieved agreement and where they did not. Richard John Neuhaus, an ECT Catholic, told CT, "You had a group of very responsible, theologically astute evangelical Protestants and a group of very responsible, theologically astute Roman Catholics, and they did come together, and they did agree."

EVANGELISTIC OUTREACH: Rick Phillips, ACE spokesman, notes with alarm that following release of "The Gift of Salvation" last October, ECT leaders met with Catholic bishops from Latin America.

At that meeting, Cardinal Cassidy, a top Vatican leader, presented a paper in which he called for "newcomers" to "not target for their evangelizing work the active, baptized members of the church that has been responsible for the original evangelization" of a country.

Phillips asks, "What are the implications of missionaries in South America trying to raise support?" But ECT leaders have made strong statements in favor of evangelistic outreach (CT, Mar. 2, 1998, p. 70). Also, "The Gift of Salvation" says, "Evangelicals must speak the gospel to Catholics, and Catholics to evangelicals."

Despite its concerns, ACE sees value in dialogue with Catholics and also remains committed to evangelical unity. Armstrong, Horton, and Sproul were among ACE members who accepted an invitation to discuss "The Gift of Salvation" in Washington. Armstrong says that since the release of "The Gift of Salvation," he has spent much time in discussion with ECT evangelicals. Armstrong says, "I think some of the opposition that has been raised could have been cut off had . . . they heeded the counsel of several within their circle who cautioned them not to go quite so quickly."

BIBLES for China

"For $4.00 you can place a Bible into the hands of a Chinese House Church Christian.

These Bibles are full Bibles — both Old and New Testaments. They are hard bound and printed LEGALLY in China.

Because these Bibles are printed and distributed legally, there is not the associated risk to the Chinese believers as with smuggled Bibles."

EGYPT

Packed house: Palau speaks to an overflow crowd of 4,000 at Kasr el-Dobara.

Crowds Exceed Palau's Expectations

Adapting technological methods developed earlier by Billy Graham's Global Mission (CT, April 24, 1995, p. 36), Luis Palau preached to more than 600,000 Egyptians last month in the country's largest evangelistic outreach in modern history.

Palau preached from Cairo's Kasr el-Dobara, one of the largest Protestant congregations in the Middle East, from March 12 to 15. The church immediately edited and copied the videotaped services, then sent couriers across the country to 570 primarily Presbyterian churches, which televised the videos the next day. One service ended early due to a bomb threat. Organizers earlier expected only 200 churches to be involved. "It's reason for people who have been praying to rejoice," Palau told CT. Because overflow crowds attended, many outlying locations plan on immediately rescreening the videos.

Egyptian Christians face a climate of legal restraint and are also being victimized by Muslim militants in many parts of Egypt (CT, Aug. 11, 1997, p. 44). Palau initially planned to address nominal believers with the intent of avoiding unnecessary offense to Muslims, but church leaders encouraged boldness.

Menes Abdul Noor, pastor of Kasr el-Dobara, requested that "Christians in the West keep pressure on all governments because it works to the protection of fellow believers."

Leaders are enthusiastic about reaching cultural and nominal Christians. Traditional Orthodox teaching and custom have kept Orthodox and evangelical groups from significant partnerships in the past. This campaign brought cooperation as some smaller Protestant churches held their overflow gatherings in larger Catholic or Coptic churches. Several churches reported this was the first time all seats were filled.

Evangelical leaders from six Arab countries came to observe. Many reported they will duplicate the videos, along with printed materials, for use within their own countries.

"I see the same trigger points that were in Latin America 35 years ago," Palau says. "In the next 30 years, the Arabic world will be saturated with the gospel of Jesus Christ."

Abdul Noor, whose congregation numbers more than 4,000, concurs. "The time to reach the Middle East is now."

GUYANA

Christians Help Reform Constitution

Guyanese Christians are taking a prominent role in re-crafting the nation's constitution in hopes of making the South American country more democratic.

Ernest Belisle, moderator of the Methodist Church in Guyana, has been named chair of the Forum of Constitutional Reform. The forum is bringing together churches, trade unions, and human-rights organizations to recommend changes to the constitution for protection of human rights and the promotion of interracial harmony. They hope a new constitution will be adopted by Parliament within three years.

The drive to reform the constitution comes after a violent election season late last year. In December, 77-year-old Chicago-born Janet Jagan succeeded her late husband, Cheddi, as president. She earlier had been general secretary of the ruling People's Progressive Party (PPP).

Election campaigns have often agitated racial divisions. The country is nearly half Indo-Guyanese (mainly Hindus and Muslims) who support the PPP. Most of the one-third of Afro-Guyanese (predominantly Christians) back the opposition People's National Congress (PNC).

Racial tensions exacerbated during a nearly two-week delay in declaration of final results. PNC backers took to the streets of Georgetown, charging electoral fraud and attacking Indo-Guyanese.

Following a series of bomb attacks, the Guyana Council of Churches cosponsored a national prayer service with Hindu and Muslim leaders.

Anglican Bishop Randolph George and Roman Catholic Bishop Benedict Singh issued a joint letter calling for Christians "to recognize that, through acts of kindness . . . the barriers of fear and insecurity can and will be removed. If we waste this opportunity, we may find ourselves doomed to the wages of division and strife followed by the destruction of our country."

Christian churches are among the few institutions in Guyana whose membership

Presidential celebration: Supporters of Jagan dance following her election victory.

straddles the racial divisions in society. "Christians have been praying and fasting since the election," says church planter Lucius Bruynning, with World Harvest Missions. "We need an intervention from God to change the course of our nation."

Parliament on March 16 approved an audit of contested election results in an effort to keep a lid on violence. Foreign election monitors will open ballot boxes and conduct the audit.

Evangelical Mission Torched by Mob

After an evangelical church under construction was burned down in the heavily Catholic town of El Quinche, church leaders have intensified their efforts to defuse tensions between religious groups.

"There are continual threats in the town," says missionary Kevin Mayfield, field director for the Saint Louis-based Berean Mission in Ecuador. "Many people are very agitated."

A large mob set fire to the Berean-related Evangelical Church of the Good Shepherd on March 2, causing an estimated $40,000 damage.

El Quinche is a Roman Catholic stronghold 25 miles northeast of the capital, Quito.

A large basilica several blocks from the evangelical church is the site of a reported visit by the Virgin Mary and a popular destination for pilgrims seeking healing.

The burning led to an unprecedented statement by Ecuadorian Roman Catholic and Protestant church officials. "We lament and reject this violent act provoked by false religious motivations," leaders said. "It is not only against the commandment to love, but also against human rights and constitutional rights of freedom of worship recognized in the Ecuadorian constitution."

Despite being concerned about another attack, Mayfield is optimistic. He says several people have made professions of faith since the incident.

As soon as legal hurdles are cleared, the mission will start to rebuild the burned-out church building.

GREECE

Court Upholds Right to Evangelize

In a landmark victory for Greek evangelicals, the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, France, has upheld the right of Protestants to evangelize freely. While allowing current Greek anti-proselytism laws to stand, the court affirmed the necessity of "the freedom everyone must have to manifest his religion."

The high-profile case, involving three Greek Air Force officers, Dimitrios Larissis, Savvas Mandalaidis, and Ioannis Sarandis, concluded a four-year court battle over the fairness of a Greek antiproselytism statute. It marked the first time a democratic country defended antiproselytism laws in an international court.

Beginning with their 1992 conviction in military court for unlawful proselytism, the officers lost two successive appeals to higher Greek courts. They then turned to the European Commission on Human Rights for help.

John Warwick Montgomery, who is currently a barrister and law professor in England, argued the officers' appeal before the European Court (CT, Oct. 6, 1997, p. 89). In its February decision, the court drew a distinction between the officers' military and civilian evangelism. The court found the Greek government guilty of violating the European Convention on Human Rights and awarded the officers one million drachmas ($3,200).

Greece is overwhelmingly dominated by the Greek Orthodox Church. The Greek constitution has historically protected that church's interests. The law in question prohibits any form of proselytism.

In recent years, Greek evangelicals have seen a marked increase in incidents of persecution. Three years ago, rioters in central Greece beat and stoned an evangelistic team from Athens-based Hellenic Ministries. Last summer, authorities forcibly evicted the athletic ministry More Than Gold from an international track-and-field competition after discovering its Protestant identity (CT, Nov. 17, 1997, p. 76).

In a display of unity, the Greek Evangelical Alliance in January passed a resolution denouncing government attempts to close the largest Protestant church in Thessaloniki. Despite government opposition, however, Protestants are making great strides in Greece. The officers' denomination, the Free Apostolic Church of Pentecost, has planted churches in virtually every Greek city and operates the largest radio network in the country.

Tourist attraction? A "stable," center, will be one of the sights at the museum.

Prostitution Museum Prompts Protests

A small but vocal number of Christians on the city council and elsewhere are protesting the establishment of a museum of prostitution in Kalgoorlie.

Construction began last month after the council gave approval on a 7-to-6 vote. The proposal had been defeated earlier. The museum will memorialize the brothels set up in the western Australia desert for gold miners a century ago. Kalgoorlie is about 250 miles inland from Perth, Western Australia.

Nowadays, the city of 35,000, rather than being dominated by adventurous male transients, is home to many married couples who want a stable place to raise young children.

Although prostitution is legal in Australia, Christians and family-minded residents say the new development violates a state "containment" policy that limits brothel activity.

Robert Hicks, president of the Kalgoorlie branch of the Australian Family Association, is preparing for further action if a dozen small rooms in construction plans are used not for a nostalgic look at prostitution but for modern-day practitioners.

"We don't agree that even contained prostitution should be supported," Hicks says. "It has adverse effects on the physical and spiritual health of individuals, on relationships, and the whole community."

The brothel museum retains the name Club 181, an establishment of the original prostitute belt of the "golden mile" of Kalgoorlie. Mary-Anne Kenworthy, the madam who now runs Club 181 from Perth, says the museum will boost tourism. It will contain paintings and photos of prostitutes' garments and situations. In addition, stables—the original, open-fronted shacklike rooms facing the street in which prostitutes displayed themselves—will be featured.

Young-Earth Theory Gains Advocates

A new generation of Christian scholars and scientists, armed with earned doctorates and a literal view of the Genesis Creation narrative, is hoping to breathe new life into the theory that the Earth is thousands, not billions, of years old.

In a departure from the Darwin bashing that has characterized the biblical creationist movement in the past, a young group of scientists and others are advancing new analysis in support of their views. "It's time to put up or shut up," says Jeff Myers, a professor who helped coordinate a recent young-Earth conference at Dayton, Tennessee's Bryan College. He says, "If all we can do is nip at the heels of Darwinism, we're not doing much good."

CONTRADICTIONS SEEN: Even die-hard young-Earth creationists admit they are at a disadvantage because of the widespread acceptance of evolutionary theory and how scientific data have been interpreted according to Darwinism.

Still, Kurt Wise, Bryan's director of origins research, says he argues for researching physical evidence from the perspective that Genesis 1 describes God creating the universe in six, 24-hour days.

As a paleontologist, Wise, who was a protégé of renowned Harvard evolutionist Stephen Jay Gould, brings solid academic credentials to the debate. So do such figures as University of South Carolina astronomer Danny Faulkner, the Institute for Creation Research's Steve Austin, who earned a doctorate at Penn State University, and John Baumgardner and D. Russell Humphreys, affiliated with national laboratories in New Mexico.

Wise sees a contradiction between the Darwinian view that countless species became extinct before humans existed and the Genesis account of death and disease as a consequence of Adam and Eve's sin.

"The Earth is young because of biblical statements," Wise says. But he admits, "Scientifically, there is not enough evidence to indicate the Earth is young."

Wise argues that there is some physical evidence indicating that the Earth is not as old as accepted scientific theory states. That evidence includes the rate of decay in the Earth's magnetic field, the rate of salt accumulation in the oceans, and the rapid recovery of Mount Saint Helens following its eruption 18 years ago.

LITTLE CREDIBILITY: But creationist analysis fails to convince Hugh Ross, an astronomer and author. "I've been exposed to over 100 scientific arguments from young-Earth creationists as to why the Earth and the universe must be young," says Ross, founder of Reasons to Believe ministry in Pasadena, California.

"I judge all of them as bogus. Once you've made corrections for the misunderstandings and misapplications of principles, all the young-Earth arguments become old-Earth arguments."

In Genesis and the New Science, to be released in the fall by NavPress, Ross describes parallels between the Genesis narrative and recent scientific findings.

Ross says recent scientific discoveries make a stronger case for the view that the Earth has existed for eons. For example, he says scientific measurements indicating that land bridges joining continents attracted migrants before quickly falling apart bear a similarity to human migration following the Tower of Babel as described in Genesis.

THE BEST BALANCE? Other Christian academics question whether young-Earth creationists have struck the best balance between religion and science. Lehigh University's Michael Behe told CHRISTIANITY TODAY in a telephone interview that young-Earth creationists are very good people, "but they're putting their religious views based on their interpretation of Scripture ahead of physical data."

Behe, whose Darwin's Black Box (1996, Free Press) chronicled the biochemical challenges to evolutionary theory, says that while scientific data do not point to a young Earth, scientific theories are works in progress that must be adjusted as new discoveries are made.

But Behe adds, "People who favor a young-Earth interpretation will think that, when all of the scientific evidence comes in, it will favor their view."

In spite of the divisions between religious believers, University of California law professor Phillip Johnson, whose books critique Darwinism, says Christians should set aside internally divisive issues and focus on establishing the credibility of a theistic world-view.

Johnson told CT, "People of differing theological views should learn who's close to them, form alliances and put aside divisive issues 'til later." He says, "I say after we've settled the issue of a Creator, we'll have a wonderful time arguing about the age of the Earth."

By Ken Walker in Dayton, Tennessee.

Religious Persecution Bill Drops Trade Sanction Clause

The Freedom from Religious Persecution Act has been revised so that countries engaged in religious persecution would lose all American assistance. The bill's earlier version called for trade sanctions against governments that persecute religious groups.

The Freedom from Religious Persecution Act, known as the Wolf-Specter Bill after its cosponsors Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.) and Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Penn.), calls for creating an Office of Religious Persecution Monitoring in the State Department. The office would issue annual reports and determine which countries engage in religious persecution.

Wolf says that the bill attempts "to highlight the most life-threatening kinds of religious persecution." The bill mentions "abduction, enslavement, killing, imprisonment, forced mass relocation, rape, crucifixion, or other forms of torture, and the imposition of fines or penalties that have a confiscatory purpose or effect" (CT, Aug. 11, 1997, p. 61).

NO SANCTIONS: Last year, Wolf found it a hard sell to get Congress to restrict trade as a way of punishing the Chinese government for its abuse of religious people (CT, June 16, 1997, p. 54). The Wolf-Specter Bill, Wolf says, now focuses on restricting government aid, not trade sanctions, to encourage change. The change is extremely significant, in part because some of America's largest trading partners, including China, receive nearly no U.S. foreign aid.

As the bill has been amended, it has been gaining support from across the political spectrum. It establishes two categories of religious persecution. The first involves direct government participation in persecution, while the second involves government inaction to eliminate persecution.

Under the revised bill, once the new State Department office has issued a finding of religious persecution, the U.S. government could terminate "non-humanitarian" foreign aid.

In addition, the bill authorizes the shut-off of loan guarantees from the Export-Import Bank and vigorous opposition to loans from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

The bill allows that any enforcement action may be waived by the President for "national security reasons," but requires an in-depth explanation of the waiver.

The law would also make it easier for refugees fleeing religious persecution to seek U.S. asylum. It requires State Department officials to be trained in understanding religious persecution issues.

Sudan is singled out for trade sanctions. An estimated 1.5 million people have died during internal warfare between the Muslim government and rebel groups. There have been widespread reports of enslavement, torture, and killing of Christians.

UPHILL BATTLE: In late March, the House International Relations Committee approved the bill by a vote of 31 to 5. The Clinton administration still opposes the measure.

Some congressional representatives worry about the bill's possible effects on trade and loosening immigration laws to allow persecuted people of faith to enter the United States. Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas) argues that the act would let anyone declaring religious persecution to enter the United States. Supporters deny the claim.

High-visibility endorsements by Roman Catholic bishops and several Jewish organizations have been helpful, supporters say, in swaying a committee that has only a handful of evangelicals and is almost half Catholic and Jewish.

Supporters have sought to persuade liberals by pointing to the endorsements of people such as Ron Sider of Evangelicals for Social Action. "It is an ironic tragedy that anybody would suppose that this is only a right-wing agenda," Sider says.

"The key question is whether the evangelical community will stand up and be counted," says the Hudson Institute's Michael Horowitz, a leading figure in the fight against persecution of Christians. "If it is just a handful of Washington leaders, it will not be enough. There has to be a commitment on the denominational level."

People in the pews are still grasping the reality of persecution. Meegan Avery, who leads a Denver task force on the persecuted church, says, "People find it hard to believe that this stuff goes on. They initially treat us as if we are trying to sell them a bill of goods."

CT 98BOOK awards

Once again we attempt the momentous task of discerning the year's best books. Here is how we did it. More than 200 books published in 1997 were nominated by publishers. Ballots were then sent to about 150 pastors, scholars, writers, and other church leaders, whose votes determined our "Top 25" list.

Billy Graham's long-awaited autobiography, Just As I Am, is a fitting choice for CT's Book of the Year. Graham emphasized the impact of books—and book reviews—in his vision statement for a new magazine that he presented to evangelical leaders in 1955. A year later, CHRISTIANITY TODAY was launched.

Indeed, anyone who wants to understand the history and current challenges of evangelicalism, its strengths and its weaknesses, would do well to work through the books listed here, beginning with Graham's account of more than 50 years of ministry.

Strengths? First, a continuing emphasis on evangelism and an unwavering commitment to the centrality of Jesus Christ. Second, a rich harvest of mature Christian scholarship in history (George Marsden, Joel Carpenter, and Mark Noll constitute quite a triumvirate) and New Testament studies. Third, a productive reckoning with evangelicalism's fundamentalist strain, evident both in Carpenter's Revive Us Again and in Philip Yancey's What's So Amazing About Grace?, a book that was prominently displayed—and bought—not only in Christian venues but in the secular superstores, reaching a new audience. Fourth, an ecumenism rooted in orthodoxy, variously attested by Donald Bloesch's work, the Ancient Christian Commentary Series, edited by Tom Oden (the first volume, on Mark, is just about to appear), the ongoing ECT conversation, and, on a smaller scale, by the presence on this list of William F. Buckley's "autobiography of faith," steeped in Catholic piety.

Weaknesses? There is not much notice here of the work being done by Ron Sider and others who preach the holistic gospel, including the parts about the poor and the widows and the prisoners. And where is the Old Testament? With the notable exception of Leap Over a Wall, Eugene Peterson's meditation on the life of David, this list reflects the evangelical tendency to ignore a huge chunk of the Scriptures. Some of the most important work being done in theology today is beginning to redress this imbalance. (In the process, many scholars are taking up the question of "Jewish-Christian relations" in a new way.) As the book review editor, I don't get to vote, but I hope that among the books recognized in the 1999 CT Book Awards will be Christopher Seitz's Word Without End: The Old Testament As Abiding Theological Witness (Eerdmans).

What do they say about the Cubs? Wait 'til next year.

By John Wilson, Book Review Editor.

1998 BOOK of the YEAR

AN EXCERPT

In the Bible, an evangelist is a person sent by God to announce the Gospel, the Good News; he or she has a spiritual gift that has never been withdrawn from the Church. Methods differ, but the central truth remains: an evangelist is a person who has been called and especially equipped by God to declare the Good News to those who have not yet accepted it, with the goal of challenging them to turn to Christ in repentance and faith and to follow Him in obedience to His will. The evangelist is not called to do everything in the church or in the world that God wants done. On the contrary, the calling of the evangelist is very specific.

SUSAN WISE BAUER

The Myth of a Better PRAYER LIFE

*Bagfuls of books on this subject showed me
I wasn't struggling alone.*

I admit it: this past year, I went for months without having a disciplined time of prayer. I didn't stop praying altogether, of course. I sent up "arrow prayers" (God, help me get through this morning without collapsing!) and felt growing guilt over my missed devotions. I wasn't suffering from doubt: God was still real and powerful to me. But the act of prayer itself was empty. When I folded my hands to pray, my words yielded nothing. I'm doing something wrong, I thought.

Halfway through October, I picked up Susan Howatch's Absolute Truths at a booksale. And as I read, in quiet moments snatched before sleep, I discovered myself in the novel. I was the wife of the bishop, a woman spiritually drained, exhausted by the demands of parenthood and a clerical marriage. Facing complicated relationships, difficult church duties, and a parish seething with power plays, the bishop's wife starts a spiritual journal. "I made the decision," she writes, "to get up early so that I can do my praying . . . but as far as I can see there have been no positive results and I'm getting discouraged."

I sympathized; and as I read on, I recognized another impulse. "I'm just wondering," the bishop's wife muses, "if I should drop into the SPCK bookshop and invest in a tome on prayer."

Pray better, intercede more effectively, ask with more power, praise with greater consistency, hear God's voice more distinctly. A search at Amazon.com yields 92 recently published books on how to pray. Buying a book seems to be a universal reaction to trouble in the prayer closet.

Many of those 92 books are about prayer as an independent spiritual "technique" that can "center" any life. But writers who ground the experience of prayer in Christian theology are equally prolific. And within certain parameters—a biblical picture of God, a confession of Christ as the only Way, an acceptance of our basic sinfulness—these Christian books on prayer seem almost interchangeable.

Take, for example, three recently published volumes, widely divided by time and tradition: Jack Sparks's Prayer in the Unseen Warfare; Douglas Steere's 1963 Dimensions of Prayer, newly issued in a revised version; and Timothy Jones's The Art of Prayer: A Simple Guide. Jones (evangelical that he is) speaks of prayer as conversation: "While God is awe-inspiring and almighty, prayer can still take on the qualities of daily conversation. We can converse as with a friend, with a lack of self-consciousness." Steere, a Friends adherent, approaches prayer in all its facets as an ongoing exercise in "coming into God's presence." And for Father Sparks, whose book is an adaptation of a sixteenth-century Eastern Orthodox text, prayer is the ruling discipline of the Christian life, a powerful act that "makes us masters of ourselves, conquerors of the devil, and children of God."

Each book reassures the timid believer: "Prayer is for nonexperts," writes Jones. "We learn to pray," Sparks confirms, "... by beginning to pray." "In learning to pray," Steere promises, "... the only really fatal failure is to stop praying and not to begin again."

And each book breaks prayer into its component parts. "Let us combine in our prayer the four actions Saint Basil the Great describes," begins Sparks, "first, glorify God; then give thanks to Him for the mercies He has shown us; confess our sins and transgressions of His commandments; and finally, ask Him to grant what we need—particularly in regard to our salvation." Jones confirms these elements, although he quotes Charles Colson instead of Saint Basil; Steere covers each stage in turn.

What about the practicalities of prayer? Steere writes, "It helps to have a posture, whether kneeling or standing or sitting or prostrate. . . . It helps to read briefly in the Bible or in some devotional classic as a warm-up." Jones recommends getting up early, scheduling regular times of prayer, and absorbing the insights of spiritual writers. Sparks is the most technique-centered of the three, fencing the mysticism of spiritual combat with disciplines and caution. We bring ourselves in the presence of God, he writes, "step by step," and he lays out the steps in a neatly bulleted list.

Still having trouble? All three books tell us what to do when our minds wander and our prayers seem to go nowhere. Don't worry about how prayer "feels," Jones writes. Instead, "trust that below and behind our scattered processes a great unseen work is still being done."

"You must struggle," Sparks writes, "and will find yourself in a continuing struggle. . . . Having once begun, we must patiently maintain the life of prayer."

Steere agrees: "The feeling of dryness in prayer is so common and so universal that it must not be permitted to make us run for cover." He also suggests incorporating outer distractions into prayer ("O God, may my soul reach out for you with the swiftness of that whining jet that has just hurtled past"), an enterprise that I personally would find more distracting than the jet itself.

These are, in short, excellent guides to prayer—but reading them did very little to improve my prayer life. I took comfort once more in the bishop's wife. "Well," she writes in her journal, "I suppose anyone can make a mistake. . . . I did buy the book on prayer, but I couldn't get on with it. This was a real disappointment because for some reason I was convinced that buying the book on prayer would lead to a big breakthrough."

I had 15 books on prayer stacked by my bed, but a breakthrough wasn't looming on my horizon either. And when I confessed my difficulties to a wise older woman at church, she said at once, "Oh, I have such a hard time with prayer. My words don't seem to reflect what's in my heart. I have ten books about prayer on my shelf, but none of them have done much to help."

The plethora of books on prayer suggests to me not only that we buy books because we find prayer difficult but also that the books are ultimately unsatisfying: Better technique doesn't necessarily make for better prayer.

Sparks, Jones, and Steere certainly make no such claims. All three are orthodox, after all; and none falls into the trap of treating God as the great Power Source in the sky. Jones writes, "We do not tame or manipulate God by any practice or discipline." Sparks carefully sets prayer within the context of a whole life devoted to God; Prayer in the Unseen Warfare deals with tithing, fasting, almsgiving, corporate worship, and the Eucharist as integral to the healthy prayer life.

Yet these books are undoubtedly pitched to an audience accustomed to solving its problems with the help of how-to books, an evangelical public that has already bought Seven Steps to Financial Success, Seven Steps to Revitalizing the Small-Town Church, and Seven Steps to Salvation. Jones tells us that prayer should not be approached as a project to be mastered, but his publisher has divided his book into three how-to sections: How We Approach God, What We Say, How We Keep Going. Prayer in the Unseen Warfare is loaded with such headings as "Steps to Success" (eight numbered paragraphs follow), and each chapter concludes with study questions ("Of what value do you find the five steps suggested early in this chapter?").

I'm not casting stones; I recognize this tendency in myself. I buy how-to books on eating better, on writing, on parenting, on exercise. And I can measure the success of my purchases: lower numbers on the bathroom scale, fewer editorial rejection slips, a day without sibling rivalry, a mile run in seven minutes. But how do I know when my book on prayer has yielded success?

Jones, Steere, and Sparks all promise me that God always answers, and each writer gives me a different paradigm for hearing him. Jones, the conversationalist, says that God carries on his side of the dialogue as life unfolds: "Daily events (and nonevents) are a kind of alphabet through which God communicates." He gives us an example; on an airplane, headed to see his critically ill father, he prayed that his father would not die until he was able to say goodbye. The prayer was not answered as he had hoped, but Jones concludes that God answered in another way: "While I certainly shed tears, while I regretted missing seeing my father one last time, God answered me with his presence. He held me during a dark time."

But how do I read my own alphabet? If I don't feel those arms around me, have I still heard God's voice? Steere suggests that we have heard God when we find our hearts changing. From his perspective, prayer is not a conversation but an examination of the self in the presence of God's Light. "Hold up your desires before a God of love . . ." he writes, "and it is amazing the sorting over, the sifting power that takes place there—if you stay on your knees." Steere never questions God's power or treats him as impersonal; yet he devotes his attention to the attitudes prayer develops in us rather than to the voice of God in answer.

Sparks assures us that if we are diligent in prayer and continue it for some time, we will hear God's voice: "The soul so prepared experiences communion with the Lord and is aware of it—unless the Lord deems it better, for the good of that soul, to prolong its thirst and hunger for Him before satisfying it." But this is as unsatisfying to the seeker as a conversation without reply. If I am finding my hunger prolonged, how long do I persist before I decide that my technique is at fault?

These books, good as they are, feel a bit like going through marriage counseling by correspondence course. After all, most of us struggle to hear God in the same way that we learn what a spouse is really saying: through nonverbal clues, expressions, deeds, shrugs of the shoulder, small gifts or stony silences. A couple that has never seen a good marriage modeled before their eyes will be at a loss, unfamiliar with normal nonverbal communication, oblivious to each other's messages. A book on marriage may help, but ultimately an experienced counselor must provide personal instruction in the skills of communication.

The bishop's wife, musing over her book purchase, writes, "I should . . . stop being too proud to seek advice on prayer. . . . The trouble is that I'm such a Protestant at heart that I don't like people giving me orders or advice on my spiritual life and getting between me and God. The very phrase 'spiritual director' makes me recoil."

We buy books, in part, because of our reluctance to take prayer out of the closet: Most of us don't have (and wouldn't welcome) the interference of a spiritual director—an experienced Christian who helps us to pray and lends a hand in interpreting the answers.

The theory of prayer is, in fact, immensely simple. Tell God your needs, thank him for his gifts, cry out to him in sorrow, praise him for his greatness, listen for his answers. The difficulty lies in putting this simplicity into practice in each difficult and complex life. Here, books will always fail us. All they can do is tell stories of other spiritual experiences, and these may sound trite or heretical when enshrined in print. Jones tells the story of a friend who interpreted a dream about actor John Goodman as God's voice, telling her that one day she would find a husband. How do I then interpret my dream, last night, that I had lost my child and could not find him?

Father Sparks, unhampered by the Protestant tendency to hide in the prayer closet, doesn't mince words in his introduction to Prayer in the Spiritual Warfare:

The book you are holding contains essential information for all Christians. Its use, however, requires a context: the Church and Orthodox spiritual guidance. No one should undertake to follow all that is said here without guidance. Everyone needs a spiritual father or guide.

This warning is especially strong when Sparks discusses such mystic undertakings as meditation on a single phrase. "You need a counselor," he writes, "[but not] merely an associate, a friend of the same mind, with whom you can talk. Now you need an experienced spiritual father to verify all that occurs when you use the Jesus Prayer." Such a spiritual father might suggest that a dream of John Goodman represents, not God's voice, but a subconscious still mulling over last night's HBO offerings.

Alas, spiritual directors, as another Susan Howatch character observes, are not as easy to acquire as sacks of potatoes. In their inevitable absence, we have books. But books too can give us the key to escape the lonely isolation of the prayer closet. Steere, Sparks, and Jones all recommend the use of model prayers. Jones quotes Eugene Peterson: using the prayers of others connects us with the "experience of generations." In the ancient prayers of the church, Sparks writes, are revealed the "hearts of saintly men and women. . . . Therefore: get yourself a prayer book."

My stack of books on prayer contains a number of modern prayer books, but most show a distressing tendency to flabby ecumenicism. Nan C. Merrill's Psalms for Praying fixes up the Hebrew poems, which (as she writes in her foreword) "often reflect a patriarchal society based on fear and guilt that projects evil and sin onto outer enemies." Naughty King David. Merrill's solution is to remove God from the Psalms, replacing him with a nonspecific spiritual force ("Love is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear?"). The United Church Press's Book of Daily Prayer, a daily guide to morning and evening prayer, is too often trendy ("You are an Equal Opportunity Parent! Help me always to remember this essential fact") and addresses God, variously, as "my Mother, my Father," "Grandmother, Grandfather" and "O, Great Spirit, who connects me with all things." The Book of Uncommon Prayer, edited by Constance and Daniel Pollock, is slightly better, culling devotional passages from great writers and assembling them into a handy hardback volume. Thomas More, John Donne, Jane Austen, and Feodor Dostoyevsky make helpful appearances (Ralph Waldo Emerson, Plato, and Walt Whitman make unhelpful ones). But there's a gap here, perhaps reflecting our twentieth-century preference for isolation: where are good, orthodox modern prayers to be found?

The best source for model prayers remains the Book of Common Prayer, perhaps supplemented by Isaac Watts's So Amazing, So Divine, one of a series of spiritual classics reissued by Paraclete Press. But prayer-seekers who have difficulty with archaic language will have to make do with the brief modern prayers provided by Timothy Jones at the ends of his chapters.

A different type of prayer-closet key is provided by Betty Shannon Cloyd's Children and Prayer: A Shared Pilgrimage. Jones tells us that his impulse to write about prayer comes partly from frustration: his parents prayed, but they never talked to him about how to pray; and he progressed through a religious education without much input. "I was largely on my own when it came to the actual encounter of my soul with God," he confesses. I find myself in this same situation. Cloyd is a bit too sanguine about the natural insight and holiness of children, but her book is invaluable to the parent who wants to avoid repeating this mistake from generation to generation. She suggests different ways to involve children in prayer, models for praying in front of your children, and even projects that bring the act of prayer down to the concrete thought level of a four-year-old.

One book on prayer for adults stands out among all those on my shelf: Walter Wangerin's Whole Prayer. Wangerin has not attempted to write a guide to prayer. Rather, he seems to be giving us a glimpse into his own life of prayer. The book is as much spiritual memoir as spiritual advice. When he comes to the vexed question of hearing God, Wangerin doesn't indulge in abstractions: instead, he tells us how he reads the alphabet. God speaks through "all the elements of creation and all the details of human experience . . . through the words of people . . . through the Church." But to know what the voice of God is saying, we must use Scripture:

So you think that a moment of ineffable joy was divine communication to you.

How can you be sure? Find another such moment of similar detail and shape and purpose in the Bible. . . . What does the Bible say about its moment? . . . How does it relate to the Creator? The Redeemer? The Holy Spirit? . . . Be sure that your interpretation of the event which happened to you does not contradict the teachings . . . in the whole of the Bible.

Wangerin admonishes us, "How important it is to have studied God's dictionary in order to discriminate with clarity the words of God uttered in your own life." He then tells us, over and over, how this happened for him: of the time he finally understood what it means to pray simply; of a night when he was lost on a dark lake, unable to see the shore, and heard the voice of a friend: God's answer to his prayer, O Lord, hear my voice! All of Wangerin's how-tos are placed, not in the sterile room of technical skill, but in the crowded and always-changing corridors of daily life. They cease to become how-tos and become life itself. And perhaps the strongest list of how-tos does not have to do directly with prayer itself, but with what Wangerin calls "the pieties": "private, pious disciplines that train us in behavior and lifestyle to hear the still, small voice of the Lord." Give alms, he writes; fast, worship, and pray. And find partners in prayer: those who can help you to understand your needs, examine your soul, and hear the voice of God.

I am still searching for a partner in prayer. In the meantime, I am finding Wangerin's book a reasonable substitute. Whole Prayer finally impelled me to come back to my knees, to rise every morning and follow a form of prayer, to wait for God to infuse his presence into my faithful words. I am praying for a spiritual director, a wise and mature companion in prayer. When God provides one, I will know that I have heard his voice. CT

JEHOVAH ON TRIAL

Regina Schwartz argues that the way to peace is by killing off monotheism.

If the power of a book is measured by its ability to keep readers captive and stimulate thought, Regina M. Schwartz has written a powerful book. Some of its power lies in the accessible and often intriguing style, characterized by strong metaphors and stark contrasts. But style will captivate and stimulate only if it keeps offering treasures of content.

The treasure of Schwartz's book is that of a provocation. No doubt the book will make some people furious, partly because, for all its fundamental flaws, it exposes a disturbing underside of lived monotheistic faiths. Even after the dust kicked up by a strenuous debate with her has settled, her main thesis will continue to challenge both Christian thought and practice. What about the Canaanites? What about all those peoples slaughtered so that God can offer the infant Israel, just born out of the Egyptian slavery, a land flowing with milk and honey?

With these disturbing questions, Schwartz sets out on a journey to explore "the biblical sources" of national conflicts, racial hatreds, and ethnic divisions. At the center of her interest lies the relation between monotheism and identity. The subtitle states her thesis most tersely: "The Violent Legacy of Monotheism." She explains, "Whether as singleness (this God against the others) or totality (this is all the God there is), monotheism abhors, reviles, rejects, and ejects whatever it defines as outside its compass." Given that the belief in one God "forges identity antithetically," it issues in a mistaken notion of identity ("we are 'us' because we are not 'them'") and contributes to a violent practice ("we can remain 'us' only if we obliterate 'them'").

Why does belief in one God forge identities antithetically? one could ask, wondering whether the chain with which Schwartz connects violence to monotheism might lack a crucial link. And why is the claim to distinctive identity sufficiently important to spawn violence? The answer, argues Schwartz, lies in the principle of scarcity—the belief that everything is in short supply and must be competed for. This principle, too, is rooted in biblical monotheism, we are told. "Scarcity is encoded in the Bible as a principle of Oneness (one land, one people, one nation) and in monotheistic thinking

The Violent Legacy of Monotheism

(one Deity), it becomes a demand of exclusive allegiance that threatens with the violence of exclusion."

The story of Cain and Abel provides Schwartz with the key to the evils of monotheism. She calls it a story of "original violence." Unlike the story of original sin, though, the story of original violence does not suggest that we kill because Cain did, but that we kill for similar reasons. Without stating so explicitly, however, Schwartz implies that, at another level, the story of Cain and Abel is a story of original sin, with this twist: the sinner is not Cain but his divine Maker. We kill because God did something wrong, argues Schwartz. Cain was enraged by God's arbitrary decision to accept Abel's sacrifice and reject Cain's; we all kill because of the same arbitrariness of the one God of the Bible. "What kind of God is this who chooses one sacrifice over the other? This God who excludes some and prefers others, who casts some out, is a monotheistic God—monotheistic not only because he demands allegiance to himself alone but because he confers his favor on one alone."

Just as in the story of Jacob and Esau some "unexplained scarcity makes a human father have only one blessing to confer but two sons to receive it," so also in the story of Cain and Abel "some obscure scarcity motivates a divine Father to accept only one offering from two sons." Thus the one God of the Bible, the God of exclusive identities and artificial scarcities, is an instigator of the violence so pervasive in the Western world.

Schwartz is careful not to put all the blame on monotheism; other factors contribute to violence, too. But monotheism nonetheless offers a religiously sanctioned symbolic universe in which the violence of "us" against "them" is decisively legitimized.

Schwartz employs most of her arguments to chisel away at monotheism. Occasionally, though, she climbs the mountain of debris left by her chisel and, like an alternative Moses, surveys the new promised land. In that land the One and the Same has opened itself "into endless difference," and its imitation is "not a replication of the Same, the identical, but a proliferation of nonidentical repetitions." There the first commandment, "to have no other God," has given way to a new commandment, "to let every person walk in the name of his god" and let multiple gods legitimize liquefied identities. There "the old 'monotheist' Book" is closed and new books are "fruitful and multiply." "The Same" is no more in the new promised land, and therefore the rivalry for "the Same" has disappeared.

Scarcity is abolished in the land that flows with the milk and honey of plenty, and therefore violence has given way to peace sustained by the practice of generosity.

It would be easy to respond to Schwartz's book with a barrage of small gripes. What kind of book is this, one could ask, that peddles distortions as uncontested verities? Where does the Bible "insist that you slay your Other to forge your identity" (the first italics mine), for instance? Or what is one to make of the claim that Christ himself had "yearnings to be God"? How much data must one ignore to conclude that the war in Bosnia is best explained in terms of "the monotheistic commitments of nationalism"?

Schwartz can also be faulted for one-sided and superficial readings of the biblical texts. Take the key biblical passage in her book, the story of Cain and Abel. Why assume that God's acceptance of Abel's sacrifice and rejection of Cain's is arbitrary? Simply because the text does not state the reason explicitly? Why not see Cain as an arrogant first-born and Abel his despised sibling, a reading suggested by the meaning of the names of the two brothers in the original? Far from being arbitrary, God's action would then invert the order of social inequalities established by the powerful. Or, why highlight only God's rejection of Cain's sacrifice but overlook God's continued commitment to Cain, even to the point of placing a protective mark on the condemned criminal so he would not be killed? Far from excluding Cain, God's intention would then be to embrace him.

Distortions such as those just mentioned suggest an impatient mind armed with a deft pen. What makes the book intriguing is the "system" behind the impatience. Many of these distortions are not arbitrary errors but are governed by Schwartz's main thesis about monotheism, identity, and scarcity, and by the alternative she proposes. Many of them line up nicely around the fundamental contrasts that make up the backbone of the book: Not one, but many gods! Not the struggle for the proper identity, but an endless composing and recomposing of "temporary and multiple identifications"! Not scarcity, but plenitude! So one has to ask whether her three-pronged main thesis is more defensible than her individual arguments.

I think not. The tendency toward distortion encountered in her individual arguments besets the main thesis, only on a larger scale. But before pointing out the flaws in the three prongs of her thesis, let me underscore that the distortions in Schwartz's thought often simply mirror much more distressing distortions—those of Christian, Muslim, and Jewish social practice. Our allegiance to the true God notwithstanding, in thought, word, and deed we serve the false god she critiques.

First, God's oneness. Should not a person who sees the oneness of God as a source of antithetically constructed identities and the consequent exclusion of the other deal with the fact that God's oneness correlates with the stress on the common humanity of all people? Schwartz never does. Inversely, should not a person who argues that the belief in many gods will eliminate the polarity between "us" and "them" explain why this belief will not simply multiply that same polarity at a different level? With many gods, why would there be peace instead of struggle of all against all, unconstrained by anything but the law of the jungle in which the strong swallow the weak?

Schwartz protests this suggestion. To advocate many gods, she writes, is "not to endorse some kind of Nietzschean neopaganism; the idea is not to replace ethics with the rule of the strong." But we look in vain for arguments that justify her protest.

Second, identity. Schwartz "locates the origins of violence in identity formation, arguing that imagining identity as an act of distinguishing and separating from others, of boundary making and line drawing, is the most frequent and fundamental act of violence we commit." What she fails to explain is how identity can be imagined at all without acts of "distinguishing and separating from others." Without such acts, would not all differences melt away so that there would be nobody, strictly speaking, to be engaged in such temporary identifications? She also fails to explain why "temporary identifications" would be less violent than stable identities. Could not temporary identifications, precisely because they are temporary and therefore uncertain, be potentially more violent than are the stable and therefore more secure identities?

Third, scarcity. As Peter Berkowitz puts it in a review of her book, Schwartz writes "as if scarcity were an idea that the Bible arbitrarily invented and violently inscribed in the mind of the faithful, as if scarcity were a law manufactured by monotheism out of thin air and which, if we were to construct the correct concepts, we would be free to think away." The problem of scarcity is so much a part of the world we inhabit that a world in which scarcity could not (not: would not!) occur is strictly unimaginable—except as a world of the dead in which nothing could be scarce because nothing could be possessed. Every plenitude carries in it its own potential scarcity.

With all the small and large flaws in Schwartz's book, one may think that we should simply abandon it to the "gnawing critique of mice." For two reasons I think this would be a mistake. First, scattered throughout the book are significant insights. For instance, Schwartz rightly warns against the all-too-common conflation of exodus and conquest as a result of which exodus (as a metaphor) becomes unthinkable without violence.

Also, she rightly highlights the insight that, metaphorically speaking, the life of a sojourner moving about with a tent may be religiously more desirable than settled life in palaces. Finally, she is bold enough to suggest that both memory and community "depend upon forgetting" and that rather than dissolving community, a certain kind of forgetting may in fact build community. For these insights and more, Schwartz's book should be read.

The second, and more important, reason why we should read the book consists in a challenge that Schwartz's three-pronged thesis poses for Christian thinking about scarcity, identity, and the nature of God. I do not mean an apologetic challenge that, for instance, the violence of conquest presents even for those theologians who do not think, as Schwartz does, that this violence is explainable in terms of the oneness of Israel's God. No, Schwartz's main thesis presents a theological challenge that touches the very core of the Christian faith: How should we live in a world in which struggles over scarcity and identity rage? What kind of God should we serve? Both Schwartz's critique of monotheism and her alternative proposal, which centers on plenitude, fluid identities, and divine plurality, can prod us to give a richer and more faithful account of who God is and what it means to serve God in a world of scarcity and clashing identities.

Let us assume that on the whole Schwartz is wrong. First, let us assume that the problem of scarcity is neither exacerbated by believing in one God nor overcome by imagining a world of plenitude. But how should we manage scarcity? One way is by advocating an economy of desert, which says that what is mine is mine and what is yours is yours, and when I give you something that is mine you must give me the proportionate amount of something that is yours.

Why is it that Christians often think these terms and thus fuel the fires of criticism such as Schwartz's? Should we not instead, seek to subvert the economy of deserts by the economy of grace? In this economy, scarcity is overcome by self-giving, not by dividing possessions according to deserts or by the utopian assumption that there is enough for everyone. Only through self-giving can we hope to create a world of plenitude—a truly heavenly world in which the other never emerges as a debtor because she has already given to having joyfully received, and because even before the gift has reached her she was already engaged in a movement of advancement and reciprocity.

Second, let us assume that separation is essential for formation of identity and that the creative act of differentiation ought to be distinguished from the violent act of exclusion. But how should we go about maintaining boundaries and managing relations between groups with discrete identities? Christians have often advocated a "politics of purity," which seeks to push others out of our world and eject otherness from within ourselves. To the extent that we have, we are legitimate targets of Schwartz's attack. Could Christian theologians conceive of a plausible alternative account of identity formation, an account according to which boundaries exist but are porous, in which the other is not perceived as a threat by simply being other but is experienced as enrichment? I think the doctrine of the Trinity points precisely in this direction.

Finally, let us assume that the oneness of God is not inimical to the peaceful coexistence of people but is rather an important precondition for it. How then should we think about the one God? Along with adherents of the other two monotheistic religions—Judaism and Islam—Christians have been sometimes tempted to conceive of God almost as a kind of private deity, the God who automatically rejects “them” by electing “us” and who therefore provides a divine sanction for our strenuous efforts to keep our identity pure, even if this means obliterating the other. But is this the God of Abraham and Sarah? Is this the God revealed in Jesus Christ by the power of the Spirit? Is not the God of Abraham and Sarah the God who ultimately elects some in order that the divine blessing may come to all? Is not the God whom we encounter in the story of Jesus Christ the Triune God? Is not this God a community of persons each of whom indwells the others and all of whom are therefore persons precisely by not having self-enclosed and “pure” identities? Does not the eternal blessedness of this God consist in the circular movement of divine love in which the giving of the self coalesces with the receiving of the other?

It would be easy simply to dismiss Schwartz for having misread the character of the one God of the Bible and distorted the implications of biblical monotheism for life in a world of scarcity and clashing identities. It would be more difficult as well as more fruitful to offer plausible alternative accounts of Trinitarian monotheism and to demonstrate its salutary social consequences. But even if this were done, the truly difficult task for Christians would remain: to stop behaving as if the idol Schwartz seeks to demolish were in fact the God they worship. CT

“A revolution is transforming American Protestantism,” Don Miller declares in Reinventing American Protestantism: Christianity in the New Millennium (University of California Press, 1997, 253 pp.; $27.50, hardcover). The vanguard of this movement is what Miller calls “new paradigm churches” (NPCs), networks of Christian fellowships that adopt contemporary styles of music, welcoming settings for worship, and a responsiveness to the therapeutic, individualistic, and antiestablishment mood of the culture. His book is a detailed and engaging account of three southern California churches founded in the 1960s and '70s: Calvary Chapel, Vineyard Christian Fellowship, and Hope Chapel. Often independent or postdenominational, NPCs reject the bureaucratic rigidities and traditional liturgical tastes of mainstream Protestantism. Despite theological similarities, their efforts to democratize access to the sacred distinguish NPCs from most evangelical and fundamentalist churches as well.

As a liberal Episcopalian, Miller is clearly an outsider to these groups, yet he presents a sympathetic portrait of enthusiastic worship, organizational flexibility, intense discipleship in small cell groups, and the ability to attract and nurture those whose history and lifestyle have disenfranchised them from more established churches. On all these counts, Miller's concluding call for mainstream Protestantism to learn from NPCs is welcome.

But Mark Noll's warning in Scandal of the Evangelical Mind about antitraditional forms of Christian piety deserves heed here as well. The biblicistic, authoritarian style of these pastors, “unfettered” by knowledge of the larger Christian tradition, hamstrings careful theological reflection. Routinization of these churches is inevitable. And when it comes, the confluence of this style of pastoral leadership with a hierarchical bureaucracy may be the worst of both worlds. CT

THAT'S

RELEVANT

THAT'S GREEK TO ME You'll gain valuable insight into the nuances of the original language of the New Testament. Biblical scholar James A. Swanson analyzes 100 of the key words and word families that frequently appear in the New Testament and helps us grasp the subtleties of history's most sublime writing. Available Aug. '98

SO THAT'S IN THE BIBLE? The definitive topical concordance. There is no contemporary issue to which the Bible does not speak and this is the book that will lead you directly to the relevant passage. Also included are biographical sketches, definitions of confusing terms, weights and measures, strange-but-true Bible facts, and much more.

THAT'S EASY FOR YOU TO SAY You'll never again struggle with the pronunciation of unfamiliar words and names. Not only will you see the pronunciation of over 7,000 Biblical names, places and objects in this handy guide, but you'll hear them as well, using the enclosed CD-ROM.

When you're studying the world's most profound text, it's both what you say and how you say it that counts. The Broadman and Holman Family of Reference Books brings you these easy-to-use guides which translate the timeless moral lessons of scripture into timely advice for today. Grow in faith as you grow in knowledge with the most exhaustively researched and most clearly written Bible Reference books you can find. Discover how it's said, what it originally meant to the writers and, most importantly, what it really means to Christians of today. Now THAT'S reference you can really use.

Experience Today's Easiest-to-Understand, Accurate Bible Translation.

The New Living Translation always strives to render the meaning of the passage as clearly as possible. Other translations often follow the Greek structure of Paul's words so closely that the clear meaning is difficult to discern. Compare this passage from Galatians 5:1-4:

King James Version:

Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage. ² Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing. ³ For I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law. ⁴ Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace.

New International Version:

It is for freedom that Christ has set us free. Stand firm, then, and do not let yourselves be burdened again by a yoke of slavery.

² Mark my words! I, Paul, tell you that if you let yourselves be circumcised, Christ will be of no value to you at all. ³ Again I declare to every man who lets himself be circumcised that he is obligated to obey the whole law. ⁴ You who are trying to be justified by law have been alienated from Christ; you have fallen away from grace.

New Living Translation:

So Christ has really set us free. Now make sure that you stay free, and don't get tied up again in slavery to the law.

² Listen! I, Paul, tell you this: If you are counting on circumcision to make you right with God, then Christ cannot help you. ³ I'll say it again. If you are trying to find favor with God by being circumcised, you must obey all of the regulations in the whole law of Moses. ⁴ For if you are trying to make yourselves right with God by keeping the law, you have been cut off from Christ! You have fallen away from God's grace.

Open a copy of the New Living Translation, and you'll know. This is going to be a whole new experience. Because here in your hands is the easiest-to-understand Bible translation you've ever read.

But understandable as it is, the New Living Translation is a truly accurate and faithful translation, the work of ninety world-class scholars laboring for more than seven years. Which makes it perfect for both devotional reading and serious study. And it's now available in over fifty different editions and bindings, including the Life Application Study Bible, The One Year Bible and the TouchPoint Bible.

MINING THE WEALTH OF SCRIPTURE

The prospects never looked better

Ever since gold was discovered long ago, the yellow metal has lured men in a never-ending quest for wealth. Yet, amazingly, after centuries of gold rushes, prospecting, and mining, all the gold ever unearthed from around the world could likely fit inside a typical, 300-seat church sanctuary. The U.S. Mint estimates that all the gold gathered throughout history would form a cube only 54 feet square!

All of this hints that finding gold has never been easy. The few successful miners have enjoyed great rewards, but history tells more of frustrated prospectors than wealthy ones.

I've never dug for gold, but I have searched for even greater treasure—the nuggets of biblical truths and insights found only through in-depth Bible study. Like gold miners, I've experienced both frustrations and rewards in my search.

Pastors and serious Bible students know the challenges of mining the wealth of Scripture: How can we discover what the text meant to the original readers? How can we extract ancient truth so it communicates with today's world? Jewelers want refined gold, and pastors want relevant information they can apply to the lives of the people they serve.

Finding biblical treasure, like mining for gold, can be a daunting task. But a number of new resources promise to increase our prospects for success. Take a look at some of the tools designed for digging into God's Word.

Books with a Unique Focus

Gold prices can fluctuate wildly, rising or falling depending on the whims of the market. Some study materials seem to do the same. They go as quickly as they come—"a flash in the pan." By contrast, other resources show promise for consistent value for a long time to come.

Study Bibles. Through his books and radio ministry, Dr. John MacArthur, Jr., pastor of Grace Community Church in Sun Valley, California, has earned a reputation for solid biblical exegesis. Drawing on 30 years of study and sermon preparation, MacArthur assembled notes with the assistance of scholars at The Master's College to produce The MacArthur Study Bible (Word Publishing, hardcover, $39.99).

Mining the Wealth of Scripture

Along with the New King James Version and standard study-Bible tools (introductions, outlines, maps, charts of biblical information, timelines, a Bible-reading plan), The MacArthur Study Bible also offers several unique features: 20,000 notes by MacArthur (filling nearly half of each page); a 200-page topical index; harmony of the Gospels; harmony of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles; and an overview of systematic theology. Helpful articles (for example, "How We Got the Bible") and a meaty center reference column round out this excellent volume.

Meanwhile, The Contemporary Parallel New Testament features the texts of eight translations of the New Testament—King James Version, New American Standard Bible Updated Edition, New Century Version, Contemporary English Version, New International Version, New Living Translation, New King James Version, and The Message. With the exception of the classic KJV, all of these translations have been published in recent years. Edited by well-known scholar John R. Kohlenberger III, The Contemporary Parallel New Testament is also the first edition to include both the NIV and the NKJV, making it especially noteworthy (hardcover, 1,600 pages, $39.99).

Handbooks and surveys. The NIV Bible Companion, by Alister E. McGrath, is subtitled "a basic commentary on the Old and New Testaments." This book could well become a staple for Christian schools offering survey courses of the entire Bible. In a fascinating, easy-to-read style, McGrath offers key features and information covering each book of the Bible (Zondervan, hardcover, 448 pages, $24.99).

It would be wrong to classify The Old Testament: Text and Context as merely an overview of Scriptures. This is college-level material that covers the ancient literature and cultures of the Old Testament. Authors Victor H. Matthews and James C. Moyer are professors of religious studies at Southwestern Missouri State University.

As historians, they demonstrate frequent links between the culture of ancient Israel and the cultures of the surrounding pagan nations (Hendrickson Publishers, hardcover, 308 pages, $29.95).

Another book that can scarcely be categorized as a Bible survey is Reading the Bible with Heart and Mind by Tremper Longman III. It doesn't just explain the Bible; it explains how to read the Bible. It's obvious that Longman wants to spark a passion for God's Word—not merely for the information, but for an encounter with the life-changing power of God. He gives a lot of space to understanding the genres of biblical literature, but this book communicates far better than one would expect from a Old Testament scholar. It easily could serve as a resource for teaching a college-age or adult Sunday school class. Others will use the book's review of hermeneutical principles or list of shortsighted perspectives to teach those who think the Bible is too confusing to understand (NavPress, paperback, 234 pages, $18).

Harold L. Willmington, vice president of Liberty University (Lynchburg, Va.), offers his Bible Handbook as a tool to equip new believers and introduce them to biblical knowledge. But this convenient volume will undoubtedly service pastors and teachers who seek practical tools to teach an overview of Scripture. Willmington has packed his handbook with a macro view of the books of the Bible, along with charts, lists, maps, and numerous topical studies (Tyndale Publishers, hardcover, 947 pages, $19.99).

Topical studies. A number of new releases address theological issues in a topical manner. Alistair E. McGrath, theology teacher at Oxford University and research professor of systematic theology at Regent College as well as a contributing editor for CHRISTIANITY TODAY, has written Studies in Doctrine. He covers doctrinal basics and then offers detailed discussions on the Trinity, Jesus, and the doctrine of justification by faith. McGrath applies his training and intellect in ways that laypeople appreciate. Even if you're not inclined to read his book for the theology, you'll enjoy it for his many stories and illustrations. McGrath is not merely a scholar; he is a gifted communicator (Zondervan Publishing House, hardcover, 480 pages, $24.99).

Four recent books from Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company could be categorized as topical studies:

The Gospel for All Christians: Rethinking the Gospel Audiences challenges the view that claims each of the Gospels was tailored for a specific audience (paperback, 220 pages, $22).

Paul Barnett's Jesus and the Logic of History tackles issues related to the historical credibility of Jesus in the Gospels. Evangelicals will appreciate Barnett's careful analysis of the historical methodology necessary for reading the Gospels (paperback, 182 pages, $18).

The Theology of Paul the Apostle, by James D. G. Dunn, uses Paul's letter to the Romans as a template for building a fuller view of Paul's theology, and it covers the range of Christian theology (hardcover, 808 pages, $45).

N. T. Wright's What Saint Paul Really Said: Was Paul of Tarsus the Real Founder of Christianity? provides an overview of Pauline theology.

INTRODUCING THE SWINDOLL LEADERSHIP LIBRARY

EACH VOLUME OF THE SWINDOLL LEADERSHIP LIBRARY INTEGRATES IMPORTANT THEOLOGICAL AND CULTURAL ISSUES WITH PRACTICAL LEADERSHIP CONCERNS. THIS POWERFUL NEW SERIES COMBINES CHARLES SWINDOLL'S UNMATCHED ACADEMIC AND PASTORAL LEADERSHIP WITH DALLAS THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY'S STELLAR REPUTATION FOR TRAINING AND SCHOLARSHIP.

"HERE ARE THE FIRST FIVE VOLUMES IN WHAT WILL ULTIMATELY BE A LIBRARY OF 40 BOOKS FOR GOD'S PEOPLE IN THE TRENCHES. It's designed for those who don't necessarily read academic journals or attend seminary classes but who are vitally interested in improving their service to God and the Kingdom. Biblical above all, these volumes will be theologically sound but in tune with where we are today.

"I HAVE PERSONALLY INTERACTED WITH ALL OF THE AUTHORS OF THESE VOLUMES, and my respect is off the chart for their knowledge and commitment to Christ. They have the spiritual gifts and special qualifications to make this enormously important project spiritually invaluable. I believe this library will be one of the most widely used series in all of Christendom."

Mining the Wealth of Scripture

Wright argues that Paul did not invent his gospel, but preached the gospel of Christ. Wright also shows that Paul believed in the divinity of Christ without abandoning his Jewish monotheistic roots (paperback, 192 pages, $14).

Brad H. Young promotes a similar theme in Paul, the Jewish Theologian: A Pharisee Among Christians, Jews, and Gentiles. Young demonstrates that Paul's teachings depended on his Jewish roots and must be interpreted through Jewish eyes. Young suggests it was Paul's cross-cultural abilities—not a departure from his Jewish upbringing—that enabled him as a Jew to connect with the Hellenistic culture around him. Young is president and founder of the Gospel Research Foundation, committed to exploring the Jewish roots in the Christian faith (Hendrickson Publishers, paperback, 164 pages, $12.95).

Other recent topical studies deserve mention. Dallas Theological Seminary's Robert P. Lightner writes on the end times in Last Days' Handbook. It provides an excellent overview of various evangelical positions on eschatology (Thomas Nelson Publishers, paperback, 242 pages, $12.99). Hendrickson Publishers offers Joachim Gnlika's book Jesus of Nazareth: Message and History, the English translation of a work released a few years ago. Gnlika addresses the historical question of Jesus not as a biography, but by inquiring about his ministry and his message (hardcover, 346 pages, $24.95). Also from Hendrickson is Craig S. Keener's The Spirit in the Gospels and Acts: Divine Purity and Power, which traces ancient Jewish views of God's Spirit. Keener argues that the early church saw the Holy Spirit's work in terms of cleansing and empowering (hardcover, 282 pages, $24.95).

Another book that examines spiritual powers is Clinton E. Arnold's 3 Crucial Questions About Spiritual Warfare, published by Baker Books. Arnold, professor at Talbot School of Theology, answers questions debated in some evangelical and charismatic circles: What is spiritual warfare? Can a Christian be demon-possessed? Are we called to engage territorial spirits? Regardless of one's predisposition on the subjects, Arnold's book is an important read that will help to sort out the issues and define a clear, biblical response (paperback, 224 pages, $11.99).

Cultural studies. Customs and

cultures of ancient peoples in faraway lands can confuse modern readers of the Bible. A couple of excellent books offer help at reducing the time and distance between now and then.

Ancient Egypt and the Old Testament provides insights into the ancient world by explaining many intriguing mysteries behind the biblical text. The author, John D. Currid, shows how Egyptian culture had an impact on the Old Testament patriarchs. He analyzes the biblical Books of History to suggest links between Egypt and Israel. He also demonstrates the influence of Egyptian wisdom literature on the Books of Poetry and Prophecy. Currid, an associate professor at Reformed Theological Seminary, paints the cultural context necessary for reading the Old Testament (Baker, paperback, 269 pages, $21.99).

Also covering the background and context of the Pentateuch is The IVP Bible Background and Commentary, by John H. Walton and Victor H. Matthews.

They use nontechnical terms to make their information accessible to lay readers, providing a scriptural reference format, a glossary of terms and names, historical maps and charts, and introductory essays on each book (InterVarsity Press, hardcover, 284 pages, $19.99).

A unique approach is what could be called "reverse" cultural studies. Rather than explain biblical culture for modern readers, these books begin with current issues and return to the Bible for principles that pertain to those issues. These books interpret contemporary culture in light of Scripture rather than analyze ancient culture, hoping to find information that connects with today's issues.

The following two books help readers understand the Bible better by bridging the gap between our modern times and ancient cultures:

InterVarsity Press's The Complete Book of Everyday Christianity: An A-to-Z Guide to Following Christ in Every Aspect of Life looks at almost any contemporary topic. It covers everything from adoption to abortion, chocolate to coffee, gardening to games. Extensive articles look at the Bible on topics such as credit, euthanasia, crime, politics, strategic planning, and shopping (hardcover, 1,166 pages; $29.99).

So That's in the Bible? from Broadman & Holman lists references like a topical Bible, except the topics have been updated to reflect societal issues confronting Christians entering the twenty-first century—concerns such as marital affairs, advertising, spousal abuse, AIDS, ambition, animal rights, and assisted suicide. Sprinkled throughout the pages are insightful and intriguing sidebar notes related to issues both biblical ("Babylon," for instance) and contemporary ("baldness") (paperback, 577 pages, $14.99).

Atlas. The Atlas of the Bible and Christianity uses recent computer innovations in cartography and offers maps of the Bible, along with maps covering nearly 2,000 years of church history. Missionary maps demonstrate the worldwide spread of Christianity. Historical maps provide snapshots of religious movements—for example, the distribution of Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregational churches in the U.S. during 1850. Commentary, instructive diagrams, and color photos complement the 160 full-color maps (Baker Books, hardcover, 160 pages, $29.99).

One-of-a-Kind. That's Easy for You to Say: Your Quick Guide to Pronouncing Bible Names is a list of biblical names and places. W. Murray Severance's book looks like a dictionary, but it's not. Instead of definitions, the list provides pronunciations. So Mahershalal-hash-baz becomes "may hehr-shal al-HASH baz." The book comes with a bonus computer CD-ROM for audio demonstrations. Click any word from the list, and listen to the correct pronunciation (Broadman & Holman, paperback, 212 pages, $14.99).

Commentaries

Beyond Scripture itself, perhaps no tool is more useful for discovering practical biblical research and insights than an in-depth, exegetical commentary. The problem is, how do you know which commentaries offer the most help? To mine solid rock, a gold prospector can accomplish more in a few minutes with a few well-placed sticks of dynamite than he'd do in days of swinging a pickax. In this section, we'll take a quick look at several dynamite commentaries released in the last nine months.

Gospels and Acts. Mark E. Moore's The Chronological Life of Christ (Vol. 2) presents concise, teachable notes. It covers the later Judean ministry of Christ, picking up where Volume 1 left off. Moore links his commentary to the NIV harmony (Thomas and Gundry), so all Gospels combine for a single story line. This book will help growing Christians, but it will also provide teaching tools for ministers of the gospel, such as icons that highlight special study topics, references to contemporary articles, and practical insights relevant for today's church (College Press, paperback, 373 pages, $19.99).

Ed Glasscock, a pastor for more than fifteen years, now at Southeastern Bible College, offers a commentary on Matthew to help readers understand the impact of Christ's life and mission. Glasscock balances serious scholarship with pragmatic teaching, guiding readers to discover a fresh vividness and depth of background in the earthly ministry and life of Jesus. Along with the expected historical insights, verse-by-verse exposition, cultural information, and grammatical and syntactical studies, Glasscock provides homiletic suggestions for pastors and teachers at the end of each chapter (Moody, paperback, 635 pages, $23.99).

Eerdmans recently released The Gospel of Luke, by Joel B. Green, part of its acclaimed New International Commentary on the New Testament. The NICNT series is recognized by pastors, students, and scholars as a work marked by solid evangelical scholarship. Green, professor at Asbury Theological Seminary, balances concern for the first-century Roman culture with an understanding of Luke as a historical narrative (hardcover, 928 pages, $50).

The Acts of the Apostles: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary, by Ben Witherington III, provides a detailed social and rhetorical analysis of the Book of Acts. Witherington, also a professor at Asbury, gives detailed attention to major theological and historical issues (Eerdmans, paperback, 875 pages, $50).

An expositional commentary on Acts by James Montgomery Boice blends scriptural insight, rich devotional application, and vivid illustrations. Boice suggests that the early church portrayed in Acts can and should serve as a model for the church today. Writing with a pastor's heart, Boice urges us to learn what made the early church strong and how it survived in a pagan culture, noting that the vitality of the early church could benefit today's church (Baker Books, hardcover, 454 pages, $32.99).

Epistles. Several commentaries on New Testament letters bring fresh resources for the person who desires to dig deeper into the treasures of Scripture.

Simon J. Kistemaker's book on 2 Corinthians provides an easy-flowing commentary—thought-provoking, yet simple enough to inspire. This enjoyable read gives the feeling one might have sitting down with the author and a cup of coffee to discuss a biblical passage (Baker Books, hardcover, 495 pages, $34.99).

Andrew H. Trotter Jr.'s commentary on Hebrews provides excellent material for communicators of the Word. Trotter takes the reader through several analyses of Hebrews—once to look at its authorship, again to study its genre, and so on to analyze its structure, Greek text, vocabulary, grammar, style, and theology (Baker Books, paperback, 222 pages, $13.99).

David P. Nystrom's commentary on James joins Zondervan's NIV Application Commentary series and promises to do more than merely connect readers to the original context and culture. After helping readers discover scriptural principles, Nystrom wants to bring them back to their everyday lives. He accomplishes this, for instance, by using contemporary incidents or personalities—quoting a baseball player disgruntled over his salary offer, telling about a tennis star who longs for more to life, examining the lyrics of a popular song that speaks of desiring an elusive goodness. The result is more than devotional literature; this remains an excellent reference work that connects timeless truths with illustrations familiar to today's audiences. (hardcover, 338 pages, $22.99).

Another commentary on James is Kurt A. Richardson's. Published as part of The New American Commentary series, this commentary will help pastors and teachers read the Bible with clarity and proclaim it with power. Richardson delivers insights in an easy yet cogent manner (Broadman and Holman, hardcover, 272 pages, $27.99).

One of the more extensive sets of commentaries recently to become available is the Word Biblical Commentary. Volume 52a covers the first five chapters of the Book of Revelation in 374 pages. David Aune, theology professor at Loyola University, Chicago, provides scholars, working pastors, and serious students a multilevel approach to analyzing Revelation. Those concerned about critical textual analysis will gravitate toward the sections on Bibliography and Form/Structure/Setting. Others will use the expository portions of the book, the Comment and the Explanation. All Bible students will find something of value to their specialties. (Hardcover, $29.99).

If you want a deal, Thomas Nelson's commentary on Revelation is a good bet. Edited by Steve Gregg, it's actually four books in one, subtitled: Four Views: A Parallel Commentary. The four columns on each spread represent major interpretative streams of thought on Revelation. Gregg summarizes each position—which he calls the historicist, preterist, futurist, and spiritual views—in an unbiased and careful manner (hardcover, 528 pages, $29.99).

Old Testament. Three Old Testament commentaries deserve note:

Duane A. Garrett provides an invigorating look at Hosea and Joel in The New American Commentary series (Broadman and Holman). His insights connect us with those people who first heard the challenging and often enigmatic messages of the ancient prophets. The preface observes that while God's Word never changes, his world does. Garrett's book links the unchanging Word with a changing world (hardcover, 426 pages, $29.99).

For many, the meaning of Ezekiel remains locked away in a world of incomprehensible symbols and visions. But Daniel I. Block's commentary provides keys to the mysteries of chapters 1–24. Block, professor at Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, opens

The first Bible commentary series to take you there. And back again.

Introducing the first major Bible commentary series that doesn't leave you stranded in the first century. The NIV Application Commentary series not only takes you on a journey to biblical times to explain original meaning; it also brings you back to the 90s, helping you bridge the gap with insightful applications of Scripture's ancient truths for today's radically different world.

Each passage is examined in three helpful sections: "Original Meaning" offers you a deeper understanding of the text in its first century setting. "Bridging Contexts" helps you link the ancient and modern worlds. "Contemporary Significance" helps you present the biblical message with as much power today as it had 2000 years ago.

By using The NIV Application Commentary series for sermon and lesson preparation, you'll create powerful messages time after time. And you can count on solid biblical scholarship, because the series was developed by some of the country's most noted evangelical scholars.

Look for The NIV Application Commentary series at your local bookstore, or call 1-800-727-3480 today.

doors to deciphering Ezekiel's conundrums and eccentricities (Eerdmans, hardcover, 887 pages, $48).

Another Old Testament book that seems obscure—even irreligious at times—is Ecclesiastes. Tremper Longman III, professor at Westminster Theological Seminary, wrestles with the whimsical writings of Qohelet, who himself wrestled with life's meaning and vagaries. Longman questions the traditional view that Solomon authored the book and opts instead for a Solomon-like figure. Throughout, he walks the reader through a plausible, easy-to-grasp analysis of the book and provides a remarkable resource to deal with contemporary skepticism. (Eerdmans, hardcover, 306 pages, $35.)

Bibliographies. With no shortage of books, it can be intimidating trying to find the exact book for your purposes. There is help, however, in weeding through the proliferation of commentaries. It comes in a series from the Institute for Biblical Research and released by Baker Books—a series of bibliographies, categorized for specialized areas of study. Elmer A. Martens's bibliography Old Testament Theology contains resource information on 512 books ($11.99). Peter Enns's bibliography Poetry & Wisdom contains listings for 784 books ($12.99).

Reference Works

According to some observers, the largest gold rush in U.S. history is currently under way in northern Nevada. Years after old-time prospectors boarded up their mines and moved on, new mining companies are using technology to pull out of the rocks what modern miners call "invisible gold"—specks so small that the human eye can't see them. In extreme cases, 33 tons of sulfide ore rock are processed to retrieve one ounce of gold.

As a pastor, when I'm looking for that speck of gold—a biblical insight to share with my congregation—I usually don't have time to crunch 33 tons of material. That's why I'm glad others have done the work for me. They've sifted through the ore and come up with valuable nuggets that I can readily use in sermon or class preparation.

Dictionaries and encyclopedias.

Who was Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz? Where was Eschol? And what was the purpose of footwashing? A quick reference tool to answer these kinds of biblical questions is The Holman Concise Bible Dictionary. With more than 2,800 entries (including contemporary topics and issues like abortion, birth control, credit cards, and dinosaurs), this handy volume should be a practical first response to basic inquiries about the Bible's message (hardcover, 694 pages, $14.99).

Mining the Wealth of Scripture

Testament & Its Developments is "a compendium of contemporary biblical scholarship" on topics related primarily to the later epistles of the New Testament. It was preceded by two companion volumes, the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospel and the Dictionary of Paul and His Letters. One could, for example, look up the word "priest" and discover how the term was understood by the writer of Hebrews as well as postapostolic writers. With a wide range of contributors and careful editing by Ralph P. Martin and Peter H. Davids, InterVarsity Press has produced an immensely useful reference book (hardcover, 1,289 pages, $39.99).

A work of truly encyclopedic proportions that will benefit both Hebrew scholars and pastors or students desiring to mine the wealth of the Old Testament text is the New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology & Exegesis, edited by Willem A.

VanGemeren. Though detailed and academic in its approach, even those without a working knowledge of biblical Hebrew will benefit from this five-volume set (including Index). Hebrew listings and text appear in both Hebrew and English equivalent. Words are keyed to the numbering system of the Exhaustive Concordance of the NIV and linked to equivalent Strong numbers. This set should become a standard on the shelves of pastors and scholars for years to come (Zondervan, 5 volumes, $199.99).

Another excellent Old Testament resource is the Theological Lexicon of the Old Testament (three volumes), by Ernst Jenni and Claus Westermann, translated from the German by Mark E. Biddle. By concentrating on primary vocabulary of biblical Hebrew, Jenni and Westermann provide a concise yet useful source of definitions. They do not content themselves with that alone, however. They also evaluate each term's theological relevance by examining various ways it is used in the language. This brings nuggets of insights to the surface, which the student otherwise would scarcely find buried in numerous commentaries (Hendrickson Publishers, hardcover, 1,638 pages, $119.95).

Concordances. Often it pays to come back to the tried-and-true. If you can find gold by sloshing soil around in an old-timer's gold pan, why not go back to basics? One "gold-pan" type of resource is the concordance.

John R. Kohlenberger III has earned a well-deserved reputation for his work with biblical concordances, having joined with Edward W. Goodrick (now deceased) to produce exhaustive indexes for the NIV and the NRSV, among others. James A. Swanson joins Kohlenberger to add his expertise and extend this line of great reference tools in The Greek English Concordance. Designed for the student not fluent in New Testament Greek (headings and listings appear in Greek and are transliterated), this book will save busy pastors a lot of time. You can turn in your NIV concordance to perhaps a dozen different English words to find all the occurrences of a single Greek word, or you can turn to one listing in The Greek English Concordance. (Zondervan, hardcover, 1,131 pages, $39.99).

With the immense array of resources like these covered here, prospecting for biblical riches has never been better. The student or pastor who takes advantage of these books will find valuable nuggets of information on biblical culture, grammar, and history that will expand their appreciation for and application of God's Word.

By Richard Doebl, pastor of the Gospel Tabernacle in Cloquet, Minnesota.

CYBER-BOOST YOUR FAITH

The latest Bible study software will empower your study at any level.

Unless you're new to modern-day technology, you probably know that computers now help run nearly every business and nonprofit office, and they populate virtually one out of every two households.

Moreover, you may know that Bible programs for personal computers bring tremendous benefits to reading and studying the Scriptures, for two main reasons:

1. You can search Bible passages with amazing speed, then read and write about them with ease—particularly if you're a pastor, teacher, or youth leader who regularly prepares Bible-based lessons.

2. You can select from a dizzying catalog of affordable add-ons in the form of Bible translations, reference works, homiletic aids, and related books that are now available in electronic form—and they won't take up bookshelf space because they reside on your hard disk until you call them up on your personal computer.

SEVEN CATEGORIES

Whether you love your Macintosh, still prefer MS-DOS, or use an Intel-compatible PC running Microsoft Windows 3.1 or Windows 95, you can choose from many fine Bible-study programs today. These programs can be divided into five general categories and two new or additional categories.

1. Academic—programs intended for scholars or those who have some knowledge of the original Hebrew and Greek.

2. Professional—programs intended for those in ministry (such as pastors, youth leaders, and Sunday school teachers) or others who want to do serious Scripture study but with a layman's approach to the original languages.

3. Devotional—programs intended for daily Bible reading (generally these offer only one Bible translation instead of a grocery list of them).

4. Family—programs with an emphasis on colorful maps, multimedia, or audio presentation.

5. Add-ons—electronic books intended for standalone use, or (ideally) searching and reading that's well-integrated with a Bible-study program.

In addition to rapid growth in that fifth category, software publishers in the past year have also given us many new titles in two new categories:

6. Bible-language tutorials.

7. Children's Bible-based games and activity programs.

This article attempts to be comprehensive, listing the products of 65 companies across all seven categories. Indeed, many good products exist for the benefit of everyone. However, more programs have come to market, especially for children, than can be listed in this space.

Prices vary widely, depending on the program and its edition, not to mention add-on options.

Many companies' Web sites offer demo versions of their Bible software you can download free, as well as illustrative screen shots of their Bible programs for adults or children. (See the end of the article for vendors' e-mail addresses and Web sites, if known.)

ACADEMIC

• Hermeneutika Company (406/837-2244, 800/74-BIBLE) aggressively develops BibleWorks 3.5 in 32-bit and 16-bit Windows versions. It's a finely tailored application intended for exegetical-expositional pastors, teachers, and missionaries, with more than 65 Bibles and reference works in 14 languages. It contains original language texts, grammatical morphologies and lexicons, as well as many English and European-language Bible translations. It is intended for use by those who may or may not be competent in Greek or Hebrew and who wish to break the language barrier of contemporary languages. Available on CD-ROM only.

• Developed by OakTree Software Specialists but sold by the GRAMCORD Institute (360/576-3000), Accordance 3.0 for Macintosh has an elegant single-window interface with the most advanced slate of features in a Bible-study program (graphical search constructs, diagramming, statistical analyses, and more). Its list of companion lexicons, commentaries, and so on is lengthy, and it can perform simple to sophisticated searches in Greek, Hebrew and English texts based on GRAMCORD's grammatical tag system.

- GRAMCORD 2.0 for Windows is built on the same advanced technology from GRAMCORD (360/576-3000) but with a slightly different interface and scatterplots for pattern analysis, such as an author's style. Loizeaux's Bible Companion program comes with the New Testament edition; the Old Testament edition should be released by the time you read this.

- Also for Windows 3.1 and Windows 95 users, Silver Mountain Software (214/293-2921, 800/214-2144) publishes Bible Windows 5.1, which includes Greek and Hebrew texts and lexicons, all 38 volumes of The Ante-Nicene Fathers, the Silver Classical Library of 16 Greek authors, and more.

PROFESSIONAL

- Christian Technologies Inc. (816/478-8320, 800/366-8320) sells Holy Scriptures in DOS and Windows versions, accompanied by 12 Bible translations and five add-on reference works. Christian Technologies Inc. also produces the Russian Bible and the Spanish Reina Valera 1960.

- For the PC only, the American Bible Society (212/408-1200, 800/322-4253) lists the ABS Reference Bible on CD-ROM.

- Solely for the PC as well, the Complete Word Study Bible & Reference CD from AMG Publishers (423/894-6060, 800/251-7206) presents the KJV using the Strong's system; also available are the NASB plus homiletic aids.

- Bible Research Systems (512/251-7541, 800/423-1228) sells Verse Search for DOS, Windows, and Macintosh users. This competitive product includes Bible maps, a Bible dictionary, and a Bible timeline.

- BIBLESOFT (206/824-0682, 206/824-0547, 800/995-9058) markets its well-designed and popular PC Study Bible in several editions—CD-ROM Reference Library Plus, CD-ROM New Reference Library, CD-ROM Complete Reference Library, CD-ROM Discovery Plus, CD-ROM Discovery NIV, CD-ROM Discovery KJV.

Introducing the WWJD? New Testament

MATTHEW 5

Teaching about Anger

²¹"You have heard that the law of Moses says, 'Do not murder. If you commit murder, you are subject to judgment.'"

²²But I say, If you are angry with someone,* you are subject to judgment! If you call someone an idiot,* you are in danger of being brought before the high council. And if you curse someone,* you are in danger of the fires of hell.

²³So if you are standing before the altar in the Temple, offering a sacrifice to God, and you suddenly remember that someone has something against you, ²⁴leave your sacrifice there beside the altar. Go and be reconciled to that

5:21 Exod 20:13; Deut 5:17. 5:22a Greek your brother, also in 5:23. Some manuscripts add without cause. 5:22b Greek uses an Aramaic term of contempt: If you say to your brother 'Raca.' 5:22c Greek If you say, 'You fool.'

Conduct

Matthew 5:13-16

Let's face it. Doing what Jesus would do may make you different. You may end up doing just the opposite of everyone else. If your conduct pleases Jesus, but offends your friends, should you compromise and try to find an acceptable middle ground?

Jesus gave the two analogies of "salt" and "light" to show the importance of conduct. Salt is a seasoning, but it's also used as a preservative. Jesus wants you to be like a moral preservative, bringing a virtuous and ethical flavor to your culture. Jesus also wants you to shine into the darkness, not for your own publicity, but to bring credit to God. Salt doesn't do any good if it stays in the shaker. A candle doesn't do any good under a bowl. Jesus wants you to do the right thing—even if your friends are offended.

The Ultimate Guide to Life!

Everyone needs God's guidance, whether they know it or not. The WWJD? New Testament is designed to provide that guidance by answering "What Would Jesus Do?" (WWJD?). It highlights over 100 examples of how Jesus faced specific life issues—the same issues we all face today.

Knowing what Jesus would do can change your life. Doing what Jesus would do can change the world.

Special features include:

- New Living Translation—easy to read and understand
- Over 100 life issues and how Jesus responded to them in bold text
- Introduction featuring the Sinner's Prayer
- "Where's Jesus?" notes that emphasize his presence in every book
- Easy 30-day reading plan to learn about who Jesus was and what he did
- Names of Jesus Guide—a listing of the important names given to Jesus

It holds 140 Bible stories and coloring-book pictures, five hours of narration, three hours of dictionary and background narration, 158 classic paintings to view or assemble as puzzles, and Bible quizzes.

- Kidvision Software (714/733-3446) sells the educational Super Bible Kids series for Windows 3.1 and Windows 95 users. It includes modules for teaching children letters, numbers, animals, music, and math using the Bible. Adam & Eve in the Garden of Eden, an interactive exploration of the story's characters and choices, contains music, graphics, animation, and voice narration. Other products under development are the Bible Story Book series, Sound of Animals series, and Bible Arithmetic series.

- Kirkbride Bible & Technology (317/633-1900, 800/428-4385) has published Treasure Study Bible Multimedia CD-ROM for Windows. Along with cartoon cohort Orville and Friends and the Steven Curtis Chapman song "Treasure Island," it lets children select a Bible translation (NirV or KJV), click on words to learn more, click on names to hear how they're pronounced, take a quiz, and print certificates to show what lessons they've learned. It also includes a browser with Internet links to a protected kids' area for safe online fun.

- The Learning Co. Inc. (800/852-2255, 800/227-5609) has produced Children's Bible Stories, which contains 24 interactive Bible stories for Windows and Macintosh owners.

- Logos Research Systems Inc. (360/679-6575, 800/87-LOGOS) sells the interactive storybooks Noah and the Ark and David and Goliath.

- NavPress Software (512/266-1700, 800/888-9898) sells Defender of the Faith (a role-playing adventure based on the life of David) and Amaz'n Blaz'n (an adventure quest, coloring books, and Bible exercises).

- New Kids Media develops CD-ROMs in association with Baker Book House (616/676-9185). Macintosh and Windows 95 CD-ROMs sold exclusively through Baker include The Amazing Expedition Bible and Bibleland.com that lets children "surf" the Bible, Internet-style.

- McGee's New Media Kids' Bible from Tyndale New Media (a division of Tyndale House Publishers, 630/668-8300, 800/323-9400) lets children hear and read 75 Bible stories from the NLB through a colorful interactive setting that's modeled on the drawing table of the well-known video series "McGee & Me!" Whether they have a Macintosh or a PC, kids can also engage in a variety of fun activities including Professor McGee's Bible Brain Game, a McGee mini-movie viewing screen, McGee's board game, and drawing table. Not only that, but kids can read and listen to the full Bible story accompanied by an animated storybook about key Bible figures by getting the Interactive Bible for Kids series (The Life of Paul, The Life of Moses, The Life of David, Adventures with David, The Birth and Boyhood of Jesus, The Life and Ministry of Jesus, Noah & the Ark, and Adventures with Jonah, Ruth, and Samson).

- For Windows users, Wisdom Tree Inc. (520/825-5702, 800/772-4253) sells Bible Wonders (a trivia game). To please DOS users and video-game players (Nintendo®, Super Nintendo®, Sega™, and Game Boy®), it offers Super 3D Noah's Ark, Bible Adventures, Bible Buffet, Exodus, Spiritual Warfare, Sunday Funday the Ride, and Joshua.

- Zondervan Publishing (800/727-3480, 800/727-8004) markets the Bookie Bookworm series of interactive storybooks (Noah and the Ark, David and Goliath, and Daniel in the Lions' Den) in addition to Read With Me Bible, a PC-only interactive presentation of the best-selling book's 22 Bible stories.

- In Zondervan's one-of-a-kind Adventure Bible Handbook: The Rescue (for PC and Macintosh), The Adventure Team leads children through a series of Bible quizzes imposed by Malicious Max, a computer virus who holds Froggo hostage and sets off bombs and hides in mazes until the correct answers are given and Froggo is rescued.

ADD-ONS/MODULES (SCHOLARLY/PROFESSIONAL)

- AGES Software (formerly SAGE Software, 800/297-4435, 800/297-4307) has published its Master Christian Library (formerly SAGE Digital Library) of 330 reference works in Adobe Acrobat PDF (PostScript Display Format) for PC and Macintosh people. Its Reformation History Library contains more than 50 texts, including John Foxe's eight-volume Acts and Monuments.

- Autoillustrator from The Auto-illustrator (970/330-1925) for the PC and Macintosh comes with a library of homiletic anecdotes for busy preachers, teachers, and speakers, plus it stores additional illustrations for easy retrieval.

- For PC users running Windows 3.1 or Windows 95, Baker Bytes (a division of Baker Book House, 616/676-9185, 800/877-2665) sells Topical Analysis of the Bible, Evangelical Commentary on the Bible, Hymn and Scripture Selection

Your Quest for Knowledge Begins Here

The Quest Study Bible has the questions you ask and the answers you need as you read the Bible.

Does God cause natural disasters?
Why doesn't the Bible condemn slavery?
How did God inspire the writing of the Bible?
And, what's a cubit, anyway?

"How I Became a Better Pastor"

"I wanted to further my education, but I didn't want to leave my ministry, uproot my family, and become a full-time student. Luckily, there was Trinity Theological Seminary. My counselor at Trinity helped me to establish a personalized degree program that allowed me to study at home and still receive an accredited, quality education. I was also able to apply what I learned as I learned it, and my ministry was enriched. I would highly recommend Trinity to any pastor who wants to grow in his ministry."

Trinity Theological Seminary is the only seminary in the United States accredited by the University of Liverpool. Through our external studies program, on-line learning, and residency seminars, you will receive a quality education that will enrich your life and enhance your ministry. Talk to the admissions counselors at Trinity and map out a better ministry, both for you and for your pastorate.

Contact the admissions counselors at Trinity for more information.

No message is more important. relationship is everything.

RECENTLY, ONE OF OUR STUDENTS, JOHN-PAUL LOTZ, was struck and pinned in his car while entering the freeway. Several surgeries and many days in the hospital followed. Knowing that he was hundreds of miles from home, the Beeson Divinity School family responded with an outpouring of love and support. Reflecting on this, John-Paul, who was born in Switzerland and studied in Germany, summed up his experience in three German words, "Beziehung macht alles," "relationship is everything."

I CAN THINK OF NO MESSAGE MORE IMPORTANT for theological education today—"relationship is everything." The mission of Beeson is to prepare persons whom God has called to be ministers of the Gospel for service in the Church of Jesus Christ. This requires a serious engagement with the primary documents of the Christian faith, a deep understanding of our historical and theological foundations, as well as the ability to read the culture and boldly proclaim God's Word. But books, classrooms, and computers do not by themselves a theological community make! This requires regular worship of the Triune God and cultivation of spiritual disciplines for faculty, students, and staff alike.

NO ONE CAN BE A MINISTER OF the Gospel alone. All too often the culture of theological education reinforces patterns of isolation and competition. Our job is to nurture relationships so that every student may grow toward full maturity in Christ. Focus on relationality does not mean capitulating to the therapeutic culture with its "touchy-feely" techniques. It does mean taking time to listen, pray together, read God's Word, and celebrate His presence in worship. When this happens, the chapel will become as important as the library, the prayer closet as prized as the computer lab.

Doctor of Ministry in Pastoral Care & Counseling

The effective application of the inerrant Word of God to the emotional and spiritual needs of hurting individuals represents one of the greatest challenges facing ministry leaders today. As never before, it demands a thorough understanding of Scriptural truth and a firm grasp of proven psychological principles.

Western Seminary's new Doctor of Ministry Track in Pastoral Care and Counseling is designed for ministry leaders and caregivers who desire to deepen their insights into human need and to sharpen their pastoral counseling skills. The convenient seminar format means that you can work toward your degree while continuing to serve in your church or ministry.

So why not call Program Coordinator, Dr. David Wenzel, today and learn how you can improve your ministry effectiveness with a Doctor of Ministry in Pastoral Care & Counseling from Western Seminary?

LAUREN F. WINNER

Finding Power in SUBMISSION

Two feminist scholars write about women you'll recognize.

The evangelical women in Brenda E. Brasher's and R. Marie Griffith's recent books are not the cookie-cutter stereotypes you are acquainted with through the media, much recent scholarship, or the musings of Andrea Dworkin. They may instead be more like the women who sit next to you in church. For it is the goal of these books to challenge the flat cliché of evangelical women as participants in their own unadulterated oppression.

These new studies argue that, contrary to popular perception, evangelical women can, as Brasher puts it, "be powerful in a religious cosmos generally conceded to be organized around their disempowerment." Or, as the subtitle of Marie Griffith's book suggests, there is power in submission.

A colleague of mine recently complained that book reviews no longer do what they are supposed to do: tell you whether or not you should read the book. In an attempt to redress her grievance, I will be blunt. You should read Marie Griffith's book. If you teach a course on women's history or American religion, you should not only read God's Daughters but add it to your syllabus immediately. If you are a pastor, you should integrate Griffith's insights about prayer into your next sermon. And if you are stumped when the next occasion for gift giving rolls around, consider this book: It is one of those rare releases from an academic press that your sister or husband will enjoy reading in the bath or curling up with at night in bed.

In God's Daughters, Griffith examines the numerous ways in which members of the Aglow fellowship—an interdenominational charismatic women's group—assert authority and exercise power even as they remain devoted to a religion that propounds a conservative ideology of gender. It is a superb exploration not only of evangelicalism and women but also of prayer, therapy, family, and dieting (yes, dieting—the dieting section was in fact one of my favorites).

In a number of ways, God's Daughters is a model of ethnography done right. It has become a requirement that, rather than try to achieve an impossible objectivity, ethnographers "situate" themselves, telling the reader up front what their own biases are and how these biases constrain the story they can tell. In the first few pages, Griffith honestly informs the reader (as she informed the Aglow women) of her more liberal Christian affiliations, and she acknowledges that, as a committed feminist, her political and social views differ markedly from those of most of her subjects. She even considers the way her age—25 when she began research—might have affected her findings, given that the Aglow women she interviewed, on average twice her age, often interacted with Griffith in mother-daughter mode. Furthermore, in her introduction Griffith elegantly and painlessly limns the anthropological, literary, and political theory that has influenced her work, rendering accessible ideas that, in the hands of others, often appear abstruse and impenetrable.

Griffith also pulls off the rare feat of balancing ethnography with history. She places the Aglow movement in three different historical contexts: the development of Pentecostalism in the twentieth century, the therapeutic and recovery movement so pervasive in America today, and the changing understandings of women over the last hundred years. Furthermore, Griffith does not consider merely the Aglow women of the 1990s. Rather, she traces Aglow from its inception in 1967 to the present, showing that Aglow has changed over time in response to broader cultural shifts.

Although Aglow members are frequently critical of the culture of therapy in America, for example, Aglow has increasingly appropriated the language of the recovery movement: while through the 1970s Aglow women and Aglow publications presented anger as “a sin, pure and simple . . . by the mid-eighties . . . spirit-filled writers were beginning to interpret anger in increasingly therapeutic and sympathetic terms.”

Essential to Griffith's overall argument is the changing understanding of submission among Aglow women. While the earliest Aglow members trotted out Colossians 3:18 and Ephesians 5:22 to encourage wives to submit utterly to their husbands, by 1995, Aglow International President Jane Hansen condemned the message as a distortion of the Bible and encouraged women and men to embrace instead the doctrine of mutual submission.

Aglow has also modified its rhetoric to accommodate the fact that most women now work outside of the home. A 1974 Aglow statement on hospitality said: “Because we, as women, are the homemakers, we have the blessing of opening our homes to God's people.” By 1985, the reference to “homemakers” had been dropped.

The only disappointment in God's Daughters is Griffith's somewhat anticlimactic concluding chapter. There she offers illuminating insights into both evangelical women's attitudes toward feminism and feminist women's attitudes toward evangelicalism. But she also spills a great deal of ink calling for “fresh ways to think about power and resistance . . . that would avoid the either/or perspective, by which practices are viewed as either opposing or conserving certain meanings and values, but rather understand them as doing both, upholding power arrangements even while exposing them to unexpected challenges.” Over 20 years ago, historians of American slavery pioneered exactly the type of analysis that Griffith calls for, and such an approach is now commonplace among feminist historians. Her vision of finding “a way of transposing this bifurcation, so deeply embedded in American thought, between resistance and subordination,” is not unique, but rather what Foucault and all the little Foucaults have seen as central to their mission for the better part of three decades. It is puzzling that Griffith ignores the rich historiographical precedents that have done no less than forge these “fresh ways” of thinking about power.

But this is merely a quibble with a magnificent book. Although Griffith may disagree with many of the religious and political commitments of her subjects, she never betrays any disdain for them. This is a rare trait in ethnographies, and it is always what separates the gold from the dross. Among studies of American Christians, only Randall Balmer's Mine Eyes Have Seen the Glory and Grant Us Courage rival God's Daughters in this regard. Griffith transcends the differences between herself and the Aglow women to present a portrait of them that is both respectful and loving.

Rather than studying an all-women's parachurch organization, Brenda Brasher has written an ethnography of the women's ministries at two large, fundamentalist churches in Southern California (“fundamentalist,” incidentally, is her term, not mine, and I am

lement qui commencent n les 2 des prophètes de la jusqu'à la fin du monde l'enfer. Lequel temps?

not convinced that she uses it appropriately). Like Griffith, Brasher argues that, contrary to what one might prima facie assume, women derive substantial power from their affiliation with evangelicalism.

Although glossed in the media and much scholarship as "anti-feminist" and "post-feminist," these women, Brasher finds, are ardently committed to many political issues that have been advanced by feminist groups, such as paid maternity leave, marital rape laws, equal pay for men and women in the workplace, and ending domestic violence. Furthermore, many women assume significant leadership roles in the women's ministries, and these leaders encourage other women to seize an active role in their families, telling women "that they could shape their husbands' actions and alter . . . familial behaviors."

The conclusion that evangelical women can carve out power in an oppressive atmosphere is all that Brasher's book and God's Daughters have in common. In contrast to Griffith's rendering of Aglow members, Brasher's description of the women she studied is often condescending. In her epilogue, for example, Brasher grapples with the question of why women enter evangelical religious communities in the first place, when there are so many other options that seem more welcoming to women. In answering this question, Brasher gives neither women nor evangelicalism very much credit: "With scant energy to expend evaluating alternatives, women are likely to favor religious alternatives that offer readily accessible, easily grasped answers."

It is not only the women that Brasher speaks about with condescension, but also the genuine power of belief. She seems uneasy discussing the transcendent—which is not the best trait in a scholar of American religion. After much hemming and hawing about the role of economics in dictating the religious choices of evangelicals, Brasher finally asserts: "I continue to think that the women and men involved in these congregations are motivated by something more than sheer economic functionality." This statement is neither terribly generous nor terribly bold. While scholars must acknowledge that religion is a complex problematic of socioeconomic, politics, geography, and so forth, but our descriptions of people's religiosity must be tempered by a respect for people's faith.

Although Brasher and Griffith are both forthright about their commitment to feminism, Brasher defines her primary mission as waging "the ongoing battle against sexism." Griffith, on the other hand, sees her book as contributing to a different "central feminist goal: a heightened understanding of the 'other'—read 'nonfeminist'—women, who challenge particular assumptions and contradictions within feminist thought."

This subtle but critical difference in the authors' understandings of feminism lies at the heart of any comparison of the two books. Brasher takes a heavy-handed normative stand throughout Godly Women and ultimately concludes that "while I understand the pragmatic compromises many of the women I came to know during this study made, I do not believe they are the best long-term strategies for women." Griffith may well share this view, but if she does, she kept it out of the pages of God's Daughters.

Brasher's few references to herself as a "liberal Christian" and a feminist in no way compare to Griffith's earnest self-reflection, and rather than clarifying the theory that underlies her work, Brasher merely tosses around elusive jargon and self-consciously rephrases the straightforward "in more postmodernish terms." Brasher's historical lens is as narrow as Griffith's is wide. Beyond evincing familiarity with Betty DeBerg's and Margaret Lamberts Bendroth's important historical studies on evangelical women and gender, Brasher seems to have little interest in setting her ethnography in a wider historical framework—despite her claim to "take seriously the historical contexts" of her subjects.

Particularly disappointing in this regard is Brasher's failure to discuss Aimee Semple McPherson. One of the two churches that Brasher studied is a Foursquare Gospel church, and its current teachings about women and gender certainly differ from the days of McPherson's ministry. An examination of Foursquare Gospel churches' transition from their origins to their current commitment to "male headship" would have been fascinating. Brasher, however, only mentions McPherson once, in passing.

McPherson is alluded to a second time when Brasher quotes a female congregant as saying, "Some of the stances they've had in my tenure here are very ironic to me, seeing that the Foursquare church was started by a woman. They didn't want to have women in positions of leadership like a minichurch shepherd. I thought, well, that's pretty weird, pretty ironic." It is intriguing that this congregant drew upon the historical roots of her church to criticize the current "stances," but, as Brasher did not even comment on the congregant's reference to McPherson, she must not have found this topic worthy of pursuit.

Finally, Brasher's purple prose rapidly becomes tiresome. In the first paragraph alone, we encounter such descriptions as "Elaine sweated as she spoke with incredible intensity" and "her phrases rolled out like a warm, wet cloud that appeared to pull most of the women around me into a cosmos of religious significance." The cloud simile is one of Brasher's favorites—we also learn that "As I conclude this story . . . the goals that inspired me to begin this research reconverge amid the lines of text like beckoning clouds."

Throughout, Brasher's diction is sloppy. One of an increasing number of writers who delight in misusing the word "paradox," she informs us that "the participation of contemporary women in North American conservative Protestant congregations presents a painful paradox to those committed to egalitarian relations between the sexes." Oh? In fact, there is no paradox there, painful or otherwise: said participation may present Brasher and fellow travelers with a quandary, or a challenge; evangelical women may be for some a source of confusion, frustration, even anger; but they are not, in this regard, a paradox.

Evangelicals owe Brenda Brasher and Marie Griffith a debt of thanks for amending the pervasive stereotype of evangelical women and showing, to borrow the title of Judith Stacey and Susan Elizabeth Gerard's article on feminism and evangelicalism, that evangelical women are not doormats. But evangelical readers ought not come away from God's Daughters and Godly Women thinking that, because many women have asserted power and authority within the confines of male headship, a broader critique of the gender roles in evangelicalism is to be dismissed. Although the women in these books are at ease with the precarious balance they have struck between submission and subversion, there are evangelical women and men for whom such a modus vivendi is insufficient. These are the evangelicals, represented in Brasher's and Griffith's studies no more than on the nightly news, who share an unwavering commitment to egalitarianism, taking their cues less from Patricia Ireland than from the radical ethics of Jesus Christ, who taught, as Paul reminds us in Galatians 3:28, "There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be no male and female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus." A PRO-WOMAN POPE

Why radical feminists can't hear the good words

John Paul II has for women.

Pope John Paul II welcomed 1995, the year of the Fourth United Nations Conference on Women, as an occasion for Catholics to focus with special care upon the concerns, needs, rights, and mission of women throughout the world. Beginning with his World Day Message of Peace, delivered on January 1, the pope developed his thoughts about women in a series of Angelus reflections, culminating in his Letter to Women addressed to the women of the world on June 29. Pope John Paul II on The Genius of Women brings together excerpts from these writings to present a comprehensive picture of contemporary Catholic understanding of women's unique "genius."

Primarily, the pope intends to encourage women to reflect upon their condition and vocation, but he also intends to challenge not merely radical feminists, who seek to abolish all differences between women and men, but those religious conservatives who seek to perpetuate women's subordination to and dependence upon men. Doubtless the then-impending Beijing Conference led him to shape many of his thoughts as a response to feminism, but no attentive reader will miss his determination to overcome all vestiges of traditional misogyny, including Christian.

John Paul II's writings on women reflect a new tendency in Catholic thought, but they do not constitute a radical departure. Since Vatican II, and with growing insistence throughout the 1980s and

Pope John Paul II on The Genius of Women

1990s, he and his immediate predecessors have been elaborating an understanding of women that directly engages the social, economic, and sexual upheavals of recent decades. John Paul II in particular, with his extraordinary respect and love for the dignity of each person, has regularly returned to the compelling importance of women's vocation for the health and peace of specific societies and the world. Even the skeptical will find it difficult to read these pages without acknowledging, however grudgingly, that their author has a deep respect for and sense of pastoral responsibility to women whom the world too often demeans and abuses.

Radical feminists, however, intransigently refuse even to concede the pope's good intentions. They regularly dismiss him with anger and contempt, protesting everything from his opposition to abortion to his devotion to the Virgin Mary. Other women and men, including many Christians, too readily assume that the Catholic church's opposition to abortion and defense of the male priesthood necessarily brand it as fundamentally hostile to women.

John Paul II's words do not invite this hostility. In his welcome to Gertrude Mongella, secretary general of the Beijing Conference, he claims that there can be no "honest and permanent" solutions to the issues and problems that affect women if they are not "based on the recognition of the inherent, inalienable dignity of women, and the importance of women's presence and participation in all aspects of social life." Indeed, recognition "of the dignity of every human being," he insists, "is the foundation and support of the concept of universal human rights."

In calling for women's equal opportunities in the world of work, the pope specifically underscores the imperative of combating all forms of discrimination against women, writing, "As far as personal rights are concerned, there is an urgent need to achieve real equality in every area: equal pay for equal work, protection for working mothers, fairness in career advancements, equality of spouses with regard to family rights and the recognition of everything that is part of the rights and duties of citizens in a democratic state." And, with respect to political life and leadership, including "the highest levels of representation, national and international," he holds that "women are showing that they can make as skilled a contribution as men."

Throughout these writings, the pope returns to the special "genius" of women for peace, which the world needs today more than ever. Yet authentic peace can never flourish unless "the dignity of the human person is promoted at every level of society and every individual is given the chance to live in accordance with this dignity." Even today, in many parts of the world, women are denied acknowledgment of and respect and appreciation for "their own special dignity," and, in the measure that they are, society suffers. John Paul II deplores the "abominable custom" that persists in some places of "discriminating, from the earliest years, between boys and girls," and he insists that the tendency to demean girls or regard them as inferior will inevitably compromise their healthy development. As adults, women "have a full right to become actively involved in all areas of public life, and this right must be affirmed and guaranteed, also, where necessary, through appropriate legislation."

John Paul II views respect for "the full equality of man and woman in every walk of life" as "one of civilization's great achievements." But he to the full—in the world as well as in the family. Many also retain a sense of specific ways in which they differ from men. The significance of those differences may have vastly diminished, but the core remains, notably in their most intimate relations with others. The pope's reflections upon women—their vocations, their rights, their needs—thus intervene directly in the contemporary debates about women, feminism, and the postmodern world.

These statements and others like them do not obviously label the pope as an enemy of women's interests, and some women may well understand them as "feminist" in the sense of advocacy for women. Yet radical feminists, with Catholic feminists in the lead, take them as incontrovertible proof of the pope's determination to condemn women to the subordination from which feminists are trying to rescue them. According to these critics, the pope betrays his true intentions by his frequent evocation of women's special vocation as wives and mothers and by attributes the inherent equality of man and woman to God's divine plan, asserted from the beginning of the biblical narrative of Creation. Equally with man, woman bears the imprint of the image of God. Before the Fall, man acknowledged the equality of woman, whom he welcomed with wonder and joy as "bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh" (Gen. 2:23). Sin, however, disrupted God's plan for the full and equal communion between the equally independent beings of woman and man. The essential complementarity of the sexes persisted after the Fall, but its fulfillment has suffered innumerable setbacks, frequently manifest in the denigration of women or the willful crippling of their talents.

Some, like myself, see this simultaneous affirmation of woman and man's complementarity and their equality as a compelling expression of the complex reality of contemporary women's lives and sense of self. Women today appropriately insist upon their equality to men in most realms, and they passionately defend their right to develop and exercise their talents his reverence for the Virgin Mary. Such models of womanhood, they angrily charge, unmistakably concede that women may never hope to equal men and do not deserve support for their attempts to do so. As a rule, feminists, including those who sometimes insist upon the ways in which women differ from men, remain fiercely attached to the secular ideal of radical individualism: Women, like men, should be free for the unencumbered pursuit of any pleasure, occupation, or worldly success. And, more often than not, they argue that this freedom must begin with the freedom from the bearing and rearing of children as well as from the domination of men.

Feminists rage at the pope's claims that "woman's singular relationship with human life derives from her vocation to motherhood," that "the maternal mission is also the basis of a particular responsibility," or that "the woman is called to offer the best of herself to the baby growing within her" since "it is precisely by making herself 'gift' that she comes to know herself better and is fulfilled in her femininity." Many deplore his insistence that women's employment must always respect the "fundamental duty" of the "most delicate tasks of motherhood." Most do not like the notion that women's rights include any binding duties at all. Rejecting the pope's vision of the responsibilities that accompany women's rights, feminists promote an unrestricted freedom that disconcertingly resembles equal membership in what he has called "the culture of death."

The crux of the difference between the radical feminists and the pope lies in their respective and antagonistic understandings of women's nature and mission. Feminists dismiss injunctions to service, binding obligation, and loving self-sacrifice as so many hypocritical pieties designed to perpetuate women's subordination to men. The pope, in contrast, views them as fundamental Christian precepts that require the compliance of men as well as women. Complication arises primarily because he believes that those precepts apply differently to women and men: no less compellingly to one sex than the other, but differently. Feminists see that acknowledgment of difference as a capitulation to received prejudice. And only the complacent or the unreflective can deny that throughout the centuries the evocation of difference has frequently served to justify women's subordination and to restrict their freedom. Some might find a trace of support for this view in the pope's appeal to Catholic universities and centers of higher education "to ensure that in the preparation of the future leaders of society they acquire a special sensitivity to the concerns of young women." And, occasionally, words like these do suggest that he may not view women as fit for full participation in the corridors of power and influence—that he expects few, if any, women to figure among society's future leaders.

The experience of recent years has blindingly exposed the agonizing difficulty of attempts to combine responsibility to a family, especially children, with a professional fast track, or simply with full-time employment. The pope is effectively arguing that wives and mothers have a moral obligation to put their family first. Feminists argue that women have no greater obligation to do so than men. Unfortunately, when parents struggle over who should be freer to do less, the children get less and less, with ominous consequences for the human and moral fabric of society as a whole. Normally, few would fault the pope's quiet insistence that the abundance of love and peace in "Weep with those who weep," enjoins Saint Paul. Or, as we might put it these days: Show solidarity with those who suffer.

But recognizing others' suffering is not always easy. As Elizabeth V. Spelman shows in Fruits of Sorrow: Framing Our Attention to Suffering (Beacon Press, 1997, 206 pp.; $24, hardcover), in acknowledging others' suffering we often find ways to appropriate their suffering to serve our own interests. A crass example is the infamous advertisement for Benetton clothes that featured a multicultural array of impoverished children. Benetton was paying attention to suffering in order to suggest that consumers could feel good about purchasing items from such a compassionate company.

A more subtle case of appropriation is the way some historians have talked of slavery in the United States as "the American tragedy"—the great flaw in America's otherwise noble experiment in freedom. The protagonist in this tragedy, Spelman observes, is America, not the slaves. Even as we acknowledge the limits of the Founding Fathers, we assert that they are the really important historical actors; it's their struggle, not that of the slaves, that attracts our interest.

In wondering whose suffering merits our attention and why (the evening news gives one kind of answer to that question), Spelman is interested not in heaping up guilt but in having us face moral facts. In a graceful, charitable style, she examines moral and emotional evasions, including, for example, the evasions of feminists who extol a female "ethic of care" over a male ethic of moral rules but ignore the fact that some kinds of people receive more of this care than others.

The moral rhetoric of our time would accord the voices of victims and sufferers a decisive weight. After reading Spelman, it's much harder to be complacent in absorbing or employing that rhetoric. CT the world ultimately depends upon the personal education each child receives in the family. Such education, however, depends upon service—the service of parents, frequently mothers, to children—and upon a willingness to forgo or postpone acquisition of the signs of status most valued by the world.

Feminists are not alone in protesting the assumption that women are naturally called to sacrifice ambitions that men are free to fulfill. Many women wonder why they should be called to a service that men and many other women disdain. The pope's recurring demand that the world accommodate women's needs as wives, mothers, and workers, like his insistence upon women's right to equal dignity and opportunity, testifies to his understanding of the difficulties and the pain. But he insists that to surmount these conflicts women must cultivate the peace of heart that frees them to be teachers of peace: "Inner peace comes from knowing that one is loved by God and from the desire to respond to his love."

For Christians, this injunction applies as much to men as to women, but Christian teaching has traditionally held that it applies to them differently. In these writings, John Paul II seeks to reaffirm the difference while he combats the oppressive and exploitative uses to which it has been put. In a corrupt world, his admirable vision remains elusive and formidably difficult to realize. Women will understandably continue to wonder how much they can afford to sacrifice without the assurance of support for themselves and their children. These legitimate worries admit no easy answers, but, in facing the risks, we might profitably reflect upon the pope's essential message: The rising tide of the culture of death will not be stayed until individuals, one by one, begin to repudiate its claims upon their souls. RECONSTRUCTING JESUS

The rewards of N. T. Wright's historical recovery of Jesus are great—but he raises more questions than he answers.

In the past several years, New Testament scholar Tom Wright has stepped forward as the most scintillating champion of belief that the canonical Gospels, at least the first three of them, give us a reliable record of what Jesus of Nazareth actually said and did. A modern-day Saint George, Wright slays the dragon of skepticism with a flair that leaves even an antagonist like John Dominic Crossan marveling at his ability to captivate a critical audience. Thus the glowing description of Wright in an advertisement for his far-flung seminars: "Internationally acclaimed as today's most exciting communicator and most inspiring interpreter of the New Testament" as well as "most popular lecturer in the University of Oxford's Faculty of Theology." No longer lecturing in Oxford, Wright jets here, there, and everywhere from the deanery at Lichfield Cathedral to make his case before scholarly elites and popular audiences alike. He has become a one-man show and, not without reason, the darling of many conservatives. So Jesus and the Victory of God, which elaborates Wright's views, is bound to attract a lot of attention.

The book makes up volume 2 in a series titled Christian Origins and the Question of God, ambitiously projected to run to five volumes. Volume 1, The New Testament and the People of God, occupied itself mainly with background and method. Later volumes will take up the Gospel of John through the Book of Revelation—above all, the letters of Paul. In addition to the volume under review, I will take some account of Wright's earlier published work.

With a sweeping and imaginative proposal,

Jesus and the Victory of God treats the figure of Jesus as portrayed in the synoptic Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Arguably, nevertheless, and despite some self-description to the contrary, the treatment does not represent biblical theology in a strict sense. For Wright is not interested in the synoptic portrayals of Jesus for their own sake so much as for what they can tell us about the Jesus of history who stands behind them. As already implied, Wright sees little difference between those portrayals and the historical Jesus, so that for the most part biblical theology and history merge into each other. But this merger prompts, in turn, another merger, that of the plural Jesuses of Matthew, Mark, and Luke into one synoptic Jesus. Thus the distinctive lineaments of the various portrayals are blurred almost to the vanishing point; Wright's main interest remains historical rather than biblical, and historicity is insulated against the doubts that differences between the Synoptics often raise (to say nothing about greater differences between these Gospels and the Gospel of John).

To some, the insulation will seem facile insofar as the neglected differences fall into patterns, suggesting that other-than-historical concerns led the evangelists to write unhistorically more often than Wright concedes. Repeatedly, for instance, he explains differences between parallel sayings of Jesus as due to Jesus' own variations, spoken on more than one occasion, and neglects the significant fact that, throughout, the sayings in Matthew tend toward rigorism, those in Luke toward humaneness, and so on.

Given his main interest, though, Wright starts appropriately with the nineteenth-century quest of the historical Jesus and moves next to the new quest inaugurated in 1953 by Ernst Käsemann and revived more recently by the Jesus Seminar. Wright's skewering of that seminar and its construction of a nonapocalyptic, almost non-Jewish Jesus occupies considerable space and shows Wright at his jousting best. Lastly, he associates himself with the third quest, represented also by E. P. Sanders and others who, on the whole, value synoptic historicity higher than does the Jesus Seminar and see the historical Jesus as solidly Jewish in outlook. The rest of Wright's book is devoted to spelling out the details of that outlook. What are they?
